IFC places Beta Theta Pi on probation for hazing

By Erwin Seba
News Editor

Sanctions imposed upon the Beta Theta Pi fraternity by the Interfraternity Council for violating the Greek Affairs Hazing Policy were revealed Wednesday by Tom Hemmer, IFC president.

The IFC board of directors placed the fraternity on a probationary status, and suspended its intramural and social privileges following a Tuesday night hearing on a hazing policy violation, Hemmer said.

The Betas' probationary status will be in effect until March 1, 1993. The suspensions are to last until the end of the spring 1990 semester, he said.

While on probation, the Betas must work with IFC to develop a pledge education program which does not violate the hazing policy.

"I think it is a fair penalty," Hemmer said.

Beta President Doug Skaggs said, in a prepared statement, that the penalty imposed was "unnaturally harsh."

"The (Beta) chapter feels the punishment handed down by IFC was unnaturally harsh when compared to precedents established in prior cases," Skaggs said.

"But for the most part (Beta) feels it was dealt with in a competent manner by IFC," he said.

Skaggs' statement implied that the fraternity would not be filing an appeal of IFC's decision.

In the statement, Skaggs said the fraternity would take a leadership role in establishing a pledge education program which is within the standards established by its national fraternity and IFC.

Skaggs refused to answer any questions about the incident after reading the statement during a telephone call.

Hemmer said he was not "at liberty" to answer questions about the details of the violation. In addition, he would not answer questions about how the violation was reported.

The Greek Affairs Hazing Policy requires that hearings into alleged violations be conducted in a closed meeting. Hemmer said any information about the incident had been learned in the closed meeting and thus could not be made public.

Hemmer said he could not specify what action would be taken against the fraternity if it were found guilty of another violation of the hazing policy.

"It would depend on the circumstances and it would be up to the people on IFC at the time," he said. "I don't think another violation would be tolerated if (Beta) were found guilty."

Hemmer's statement leaves open the possibility that the Beta charter could be suspended if the fraternity were found guilty of violating the hazing policy while on probation.

Under social suspension, Beta may not participate in any social activities with other greek organizations and may not sponsor any greek events for the term of the suspension.

Beta members may not participate under the fraternity's name in greek intramural leagues and in any individual or team sports while under intramural suspension.

The IFC sanction was the second penalty imposed for violations of the Greek Affairs Hazing Policy in two days.

Monday, the Panhellenic Council placed the Alpha Delta Pi sorority on intramural and social suspension for violation of the hazing policy.

Capital punishment bill fails; tax proposal misses deadline

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Senate killed a capital punishment bill Wednesday, handing Republican Gov. Mike Hayden his second major political defeat in as many days.

The Senate voted, 22-18, against advancing a bill that would make death by lethal injection a possible penalty for some murders to a final vote today. Minutes later, the Senate voted to remove the bill from its calendar, which means the issue is dead unless another bill is introduced.

The Senate's action came on the same day the House approved, 118-5, its proposal to cut state income taxes $53.1 million and create a $50 million property tax relief fund. The House rejected Hayden's plan Tuesday, heavily amending a bill containing it to fashion its own proposal.

The Senate passed Hayden's tax plan unchanged last week, and the upper chamber voted to appoint a joint conference committee to negotiate a compromise. The House is expected to appoint its three members to the committee today.

Hayden had proposed cutting income taxes by $78.9 million to stop the collection of a windfall the state had been receiving, and passage of the plan by Wednesday was at the top of his legislative agenda for the 1989 session.

Hayden also made restoration of capital punishment a top priority, just as he had during his successful 1986 gubernatorial campaign. The Legislature last considered the subject in 1987, and it failed then in the Senate by the same vote.

"I am disappointed that the Senate has again rejected capital punishment against the people's wishes, even for the most heinous of crimes," Hayden said after the vote.

The bill would have made the death penalty available as a punishment for those convicted of premeditated murder, killing a law enforcement official or a killing committed to further the operation of a drug ring with five or more employees.

Sixteen of the 18 Senate Democrats and six of 22 Republicans voted against the measure.

Sen. Ed Reilly, R-Leavenworth, longtime strong advocate of capital punishment, said the vote did not reflect the will of Kansans.

"They want the death penalty," he said.

Opponents to the measure say the death penalty is unfairly applied and does not act as a deterrent.

Sen. Gene Anderson, D-Wichita, the only black member of the Senate, said the death penalty has discriminated against minorities.

"They don't kill you until you run out of money," Anderson said. "That's why they call it capital punishment. When you run out of capital, the punishment's next."

On the tax issue, Hayden vowed he will sign no spending bills until the Legislature approves a plan to cut state income taxes similar to his.

Shunting the bill off to a conference committee meant the Legislature missed Hayden's deadline of Wednesday for having a bill on his desk ready to sign.

After the House vote, Hayden made it clear he does not like the House plan because it does not provide enough income tax relief. His plan was designed to stop the collection of an income tax windfall the state has been receiving because of federal tax changes.

"Returning the windfall should be the No. 1 priority of the Legislature," Hayden told reporters at a news conference. "I will sign no spending bill

Students cross barriers

A skinny boy in swimming trunks stands shivering on the edge of the pool in the Natatorium, eyeing the water apprehensively. He steps closer to the edge and cautiously dips a foot into the water, then pulls it out quickly and steps back.

A K-State student in the water holds out her hands. After another moment's hesitation, he squeezes his eyes shut and eases himself into the pool. The student catches him and helps him float on his back as he smiles.

The two individuals are part of an interactive program involving the University, Lee School and Manhattan Middle School that links disabled children from the school system with students in K-State's Adapted Physical Education class.

The class has been meeting throughout the semester, but yesterday was the first day the disabled children attended. For the remainder of the semester, the children and students will meet in the Natatorium each Wednesday.

Charles Layne, associate professor of exercise science specializing in motor control, teaches the class.

He said until this week, the class sessions have been to prepare the students for the sessions with the children.

"We went to the kids' schools so my students could see them in their everyday environments," Layne said. "Working around kids like these is new to most of them."

Layne said the students must be realistic about what they can and cannot achieve with the children.

"They need to be gung-ho, but they need to be realistic, too," he said. "Our goal is to improve the quality of the kids' lives."

Students have to adjust their expectations to the reality of the children's skills, Layne said.

The children's handicaps range from blindness to severe mental retardation. Some were only able to float on their backs with assistance and flotation devices, while others could almost swim.

A lifeguard is present for the sessions in the pool.

Dan O'Mara, senior in exercise science, worked with a deaf child in the water.

"You're kind of nervous and scared at first, about what you don't expect, or what you don't know," O'Mara said. "But you should treat (the handicapped child) the same as any other kid of the same age."

He said the water is a good environment for individuals with mental and physical disabilities.

"The biggest reward is seeing the joy in (the children's) eyes when they go into the water ... ," O'Mara said. "In the pool their

Legislature plans to discuss Washburn proposal again

By Chris Koger
Staff Writer

Gov. Mike Hayden's proposal to place Washburn University under supervision of the Kansas Board of Regents will be tested for the second time in two years when it is considered by the Legislature during the current session.

Hayden's proposal is a five-year plan that would gradually lessen the financial responsibility of the city of Topeka for Washburn. The plan would transfer the funding burden to the state starting in July, and out-district aid would be dropped.

Washburn is the only municipal university in the United States. A property tax has been levied on Topeka residents to help financially support the university, and in 1988 that tax was 15.85 mills. This generated more than $6.3 million in revenues, almost half of which supports the employee benefits fund.

State funds also provide support for Washburn. Money is allocated to Washburn through the State Board of Education under which the university is currently supervised.

This fiscal year, Washburn will receive more than $4.7 million in three forms: a direct operating grant appropriated by the Legislature, out-district tuition which is money from counties sending students to Washburn, and tuition grants appropriated by the State Board of Education based on the number of credit hours taught at the university.

Under Hayden's plan, Topeka residents would still have a property tax of approximately 3.5 mills, which would generate $1.4 million to pay for existing debts and facilities maintenance, repair and construction.

If approved, the plan would increase state funding for Washburn by about $10 million in the next five years. The only other funding would come from tuition and fees.

In what may be an attempt to prevent the Legislature from rejecting the proposal again, Hayden is including the Washburn plan in a higher education package that calls for increased state funding for regents schools and two-year community colleges.

Hayden contends that the state already funds more than 20 percent of Washburn's $22.3 million budget, and that more than 100 state statutes affect the operation of the university.

Support for Hayden's proposal in the Legislature is mixed.

A recent poll conducted by The Wichita Eagle-Beacon shows a majority of legislators oppose the addition of Washburn or are undecided about it.

In the poll, the 40 senators and 125 representatives were asked about their standing on the issue. Only six senators were in favor of the plan, 24 were against and 10 were undecided or didn't answer. In the House, eight representatives said they were in favor of the proposal, and 52 were against it. Sixty-five representatives were undecided or didn't answer the poll.

Local lawmakers also expressed their opposition to the proposal. Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, and Rep. Katha Hurt, D-Manhattan, have said they are concerned where the additional funding will come from and how K-State's funding will be affected.

Oleen also said supporters of Washburn's state affiliation haven't made a justifiable argument.

"There just hasn't been a case made in favor of it. I haven't seen where it would really help," she said.

Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, has also declared her opposition to Washburn's entry to the regents system.

Regents schools are hesitant to support the Washburn addition.

George Miller, K-State vice president for administration and finance, said a main concern of existing regents schools is how the Washburn proposal will affect funding for the Margin of Excellence.

"We are concerned that even though we are getting funds through the MOE, they won't be enough," he said. "Right now, we're only getting 83 percent of the funds we need to bring us on the same level as our peer institutions.

"Our observation is if we are having difficulty fully funding the program now, will this proposal hinder it more?"

Miller said the University will support the regents' decision if four conditions set by the regents are met:

■ Budget requests for existing regents schools must be fully funded in 1990 and 1991, including the final

Judge rules Marine negligent

CAMP LEJEUNE, N.C. — A military judge on Wednesday convicted a Marine platoon sergeant of negligence in the death of a soldier who had been left behind in the Mojave Desert during a training exercise in August.

The judge, Maj. Kent Smith, ruled that Sgt. Christopher Clyde failed to properly account for the whereabouts and welfare of his Marines.

Clyde was the platoon sergeant of Lance Cpl. Jason Rother, 19, of Minneapolis, Minn., who was left behind during a night exercise Aug. 30 after being posted as a road guide in the California desert. His remains were found in December.

The sergeant was found innocent of willful disobedience. He had been accused of failing to obey orders in granting leave to Rother's squad leader after the exercise, resulting in a delay in realizing Rother had been left behind.

Clyde has maintained he did nothing wrong and that he only relied on the instructions of his superiors. "If he's guilty of anything, he's guilty of relying on other people," defense attorney William Fisher said in closing arguments.

Prosecutor Robert Nunally had argued, "He screwed up and he screwed up in a major way."

Pay raise vote scheduled

WASHINGTON — House Speaker Jim Wright is planning to ask the House to scale back the congressional pay raise scheduled to take effect next week, even as House members were lining up overwhelmingly against the increase, a congressional source said Wednesday.

The $45,500 pay raise — a 51 percent hike — will take effect next Wednesday unless both the Senate and House vote to block it.

Wright, D-Texas, plans to propose that the increase be scaled back to 30 percent, said the source, speaking on condition of anonymity. A 30 percent raise would hike the current congressional salary from $89,500 by $26,850, to a total of $116,350.

Meanwhile, House members indicated in an Associated Press survey that they want a vote on the sensitive issue.

Survey results put additional pressure on Wright to abandon a carefully orchestrated strategy of taking no vote until after the raise automatically takes effect next Wednesday.

Colombia to get helicopters

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon notified Congress on Wednesday it had approved the sale of five UH-60 transport helicopters to Colombia for use in fighting drug trafficking.

Assuming there are no congressional objections, the Pentagon said Colombia would be offered the five Blackhawk choppers for $36 million. Colombia already has five of the helicopters.

"The primary use of these helicopters will be to transport Colombian soldiers or police in air mobile operations against narcotics traffickers and insurgent forces," the Pentagon said. It said the sale will help Colombia in its efforts to stem the flow of drugs into the United States.

The Pentagon said the Army would be responsible for overseeing the transaction. The prime contractor will be the Sikorsky Aircraft Division of the United Technologies Corp. in Stratford, Conn.

Boy takes shotgun to school

OLPE — A 10-year-old boy brought a loaded shotgun into St. Joseph's Catholic School on Wednesday, but two teachers and a custodian talked him into giving them the weapon, officials said.

The child was being held in juvenile detention at the county jail in Emporia, Lyon County Sheriff Clifford Hacker said.

Deputy Gary Sadowski said no shots were fired.

"The juvenile confronted two teachers and a custodian with the shotgun," Sadowski said. "During the confrontation, the two teachers and the custodian were able to talk the juvenile into surrendering the shotgun to them."

Sadowski said it appeared the incident was related to a problem the boy had with another student. The other student was never confronted, the deputy said.

He said the sheriff's office sent four officers to the school, in an east-central Kansas community of about 500 people, about 10 miles south of Emporia.

Recklessness caused crash

WELLSVILLE — A school bus that crashed last week, killing the driver and a student, was being driven too fast for conditions on a muddy road, the Franklin County Sheriff's Department says.

The report also listed driving left of center and inattentiveness as contributing to the accident last Wednesday.

Dale R. Thomasson, 46, of Wellsville, a teacher and bus driver, and Loren Newkirk Jr., 8, a first grader, died when the bus left the road and slid into a creek.

"He drove that road every day," Capt. Craig Davis said of Thomasson. "He drove it in rain before. He was the regular morning bus driver for that route every day this year. My first feelings were right. He was driving too fast for the conditions."

Wolf Creek closing petitioned

WICHITA — The Kansas chapter of the Sierra Club, claiming inadequate management and undue risks to public health and safety, has asked the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to suspend the license of the Wolf Creek nuclear generating plant near Burlington.

In a petition to the NRC mailed Monday and made public Wednesday, the environmental group said it wants the NRC to explain why it believes the plant is operated safely "in spite of its own overwhelming evidence to the contrary."

Joe Gilliland, spokesman in the NRC regional office in Arlington, Texas, said the 14-page petition would be reviewed by the agency's Office of Nuclear Reactor Regulation in Washington. It could take as long as two or three months for the NRC to reach a decision on the Sierra Club request, he said.

A plant official refused to discuss the petition's specifics.

"I haven't had a chance to look at the details of it," said Ronn Smith, Wolf Creek Nuclear Operating Corp. spokesman. "We obviously feel the plant is operating safely."

Most of the allegations contained in the petition stem from a report of an NRC investigation of the "Quality First" quality assurance program operated by the plant's builder and one of its owners, Wichita-based Kansas Gas and Electric Co.

ROTC officials increase efforts

Changes needed to be viable

By Mary Ubel
Collegian Reporter

The K-State Air Force ROTC program is attempting to make a strong comeback after facing the possiblity of cancellation, said Capt. John Taglieri, assistant professor in Aerospace Studies.

"There was a lot of disappointment last spring, but we are definitely glad to be back," Taglieri said. "The underlying impact is the uncertainty.

"We have increased efforts to initiate incentive for cadets to complete the testing and selection process."

Included in the programs efforts are visits to the Denver base, where the undergraduate space program is located; to the Fort Riley Air Control, where air power demonstrations are given; and to Forbes Field in Topeka, where the cadets ride on KC-135 Tanker cargo planes.

The ROTC program also includes internal programs, Taglieri said. Upperclassmen guide underclassmen through the ROTC system, and offer tutoring programs for cadets who need assistance.

"The K-State program was barely cut," he said. "It was kept because of so much uproar from the community to Congress."

"The program has significantly increased on-campus recruitment," said Col. John McTasney, professor of Aerospace Studies.

For the unit to be viable, the key to keeping the program is selecting and contracting at least 17 juniors by Oct. 31, he said.

Being in a non-viable status would result in probation, McTasney said. Being on probation for four consecutive years would result in closure.

At this time the ROTC program is non-viable.

"We currently only have six juniors selected and contracted," McTasney said. "If we don't become viable as of Oct. 31, we will probably be placed on probation another year.

"The 19 new cadets this semester have given us great encouragement."

"The entire University has pooled its resources to improve both Army and Air Force visibility on campus," said Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement.

The University is actively pursuing student feedback regarding commissioning to gain scholarships, he said.

"The program is a long-standing fixture on campus and it's a part of the initial land grant mission," he said.

"The program was recently inspected by Col. Eduard Bender, a Midwest-area commandant for the ROTC program in 11 states," said Lori Amstein, commander of the Arnold Air Society.

Bender reviews K-State's ROTC program once a year to prepare it for the inspector-general's team in May, she said.

Amstein said the program has recruited many qualified cadets since the cutback.

"Bender was very optimistic in the program and believes it will be around for a long time," Taglieri said.

In two years, the entire ROTC program, including all 37 schools, will be re-evaluated, he said. Included in those 37 are the programs at the University of Nebraska at Lincoln and the University of Oklahoma.

Factors in the evaluation include the number of students being commissioned, degree types and the overall K-State student population compared to ROTC enrollment.

"The ROTC program at K-State is as strong as it has ever been," said Brian Borgen, corps cadet commander of K-State's program. "The program will definitely stay."

School board discusses crowded classes

By Chris Koger
Staff Writer

Manhattan High School classrooms are experiencing overcrowding problems, said Dean Stramel, president of the local chapter of the National Education Association, at Wednesday evening's meeting of Manhattan's Board of Education.

Stramel, a science teacher at MHS, said the problem has become more apparent since Christmas break, when his classes grew to sizes beyond their normal capacity.

"Some of the teachers feel there ought to be a size limit imposed on classes," Stramel said, "because we're concerned that students in full classes aren't receiving the education and attention that students in smaller classes get.

"Of course, there will have to be different cut-offs for different classes, because some subjects can be dealt with in larger classes."

Stramel said some of his science lab classes have up to 30 students.

"It's hard to deal with that many students in that type of class," he said.

The school board took no action on the issue.

In other business, the board approved at-risk plan budgets totaling more than $23,000 for the Amanda Arnold and Woodrow Wilson elementary schools.

The at-risk plan will create comprehensive programs designed to help students at the district schools who are performing below their potential, lacking parental support and involvement, or possessing low self-esteem and motivation.

The total at-risk budget for the district is $150,000, and will be distributed according to each school's program proposals, said Lois Merriman, district information director.

At-risk programs being introduced this spring at the Amanda Arnold Elementary School will include after-school tutoring and counseling by a newly hired paraprofessional.

Clark Reinke, principal of Amanda Arnold Elementary School, said it is important for students who need assistance to be able to get it both in and out of the classroom.

"The majority of our at-risk proposals deal with staff involvement," he said.

At-risk proposals for the Woodrow Wilson School include training the teachers to use a "hands-on" approach towards mathematics, the development of a science and math resource center, after-school tutoring and the inception of a cultural experience program that would allow the students to learn about the arts.

Darcy Rourk, Woodrow Wilson School principal, said all students cannot be taught the same way, especially if they are at-risk students.

"The programs we will be implementing will deal with this; we want to change the structure of some classes," Rourk said. "We need to change to fit their needs."

Missing flight recorder hampers crash investigation

By The Associated Press

ABILENE, Texas — Air Force personnel used numbered flags Wednesday to map a wreckage-strewn area where a fuel-laden tanker crashed, but the investigation may be hampered by the lack of a flight data recorder and the apparent loss of many maintenance records.

All 19 people aboard the KC-135A Stratotanker died when it crashed on takeoff about a half-mile south of a Dyess Air Force Base runway Tuesday.

The KC-135A tanker, based at K.I. Sawyer Air Force Base in Michigan, stopped at Dyess en route to a training mission. It was scheduled to refuel some F-16s in the air before flying to Hawaii and then Guam.

The plane was carrying military members and their dependents, as well as 30,000 gallons of jet fuel, officials said.

Air Force workers Wednesday used stakes and red flags to map out about two square miles of scorched grassland and woods around the crash site, said Master Sgt. Al Dostal, a Dyess spokesman.

"Once it's staked out, it can snow and these flags have numbers. They can still see where things are," Dostal said.

Sam Matta, an Abilene justice of the peace who spent Tuesday at the site to record deaths, said the plane was in many pieces, the largest of them the tail section.

There were "a bunch of small pieces everywhere," Matta said. "There's a few big sections, 10 to 12 feet long. There's a big wing, pretty badly burned."

The last two bodies were found Tuesday evening. As of Wednesday afternoon, they were still being held at Abilene.

Counties consider joining census suit

By Alan Wilds
Staff Writer

Four counties may join Douglas, Leavenworth and Riley counties and the cities of Lawrence, Manhattan and Pittsburgh in a lawsuit challenging the 1988 state census for legislative reapportionment.

Douglas County assistant counselor Patti Hackney said voting is currently taking place in Crawford, Sedgwick, Shawnee and Wyandotte counties to decide whether or not to join the suit or file a similair suit of their own.

Rep. Sheila Hochhauser of Manhattan said all counties involved in the suit, which is pending in the state district court, are opposed to the methodology that was used in compiling the census.

"The more we hear about the census methodology, the less we are impressed."
— Sheila Hochhauser D-Manhattan

One objection to the census is that college students and military personnel residing in cities such as Manhattan, Lawrence and Junction City were counted as residents of their home towns rather than the cities in which they are currently living, she said.

Hochhauser said if reapportionment is based on this census, communities like Manhattan would be underrepresented in the Legislature.

She said the secretary of state held a question and answer session on Monday pertaining to the census and the way it was conducted.

"The more we hear about the census methodology, the less we are impressed," Hochhauser said.

She said Wyandotte county conducted a local review of its census results and presented compelling evidence to the reapportionment committee that there had been an incorrect count. Wyandotte county was able to present its case against the census to the committee.

"Wyandotte has the staff and can afford good research and representation," she said.

Hochhauser said if more of the wealthier counties join in the lawsuit, the chances of successfully contesting the census are better.

She said her ideal situation would be to have the courts invalidate the census and postpone the reapportionment until the methodology is re-evaluated.

"That would be my position, but that is not the law," Hochhauser said.

The scheduling conference for the state suit is currently set for Feb. 21, Hackney said.

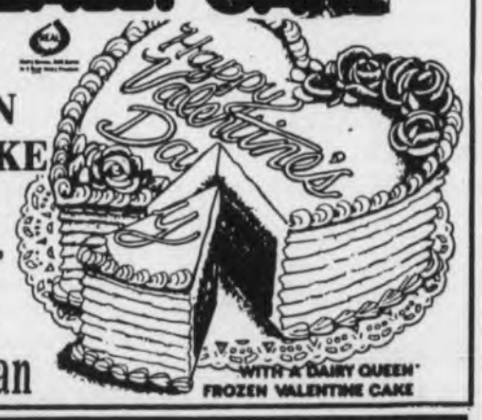
"Unfortunately, the lawsuit will probably not be completed before the reapportionment," Hackney said.

Rep. Donna Whiteman of Hutchinson, minority whip on the reapportionment committee, said it has been hearing testimony from various areas through the secretary of state's office.

"There will be some inequities in areas where the population is down, but the statute requires us to use the state census for reapportionment," Whiteman said.

She said the committee will soon be adopting criteria that will be used in the drawing of maps for the various districts.

"The major metro areas, which seem to be where many of the seats will be shifted, will be drawing their own," Whiteman said.



The redrawing of maps will begin on Feb. 14 with each of the 125 house districts averaging roughly 18,334 people.

"The reapportionment issue will remain alive with the lawsuits. However, it is a separate process that must work its way through the courts," Whiteman said.

She said the lawsuit cannot stop reapportionment, but it can be used to re-evaluate some of the inequities.

Compromise in order on gun control problem

If blind people wanted to drive, would we issue them driver's licenses?

Likewise, should mentally unbalanced individuals or convicted criminals be allowed to purchase handguns?

Die-hard opponents of gun control legislation often cite the Second Amendment to the Constitution of the United States as a defense of their right to bear arms. Many such people also claim the Second Amendment is what prevents Americans from waking up under a totalitarian regime.

Therefore, following this train of thought, if citizens of the United States are allowed to bear arms, the government would never dare deny any of the rights outlined in the Constitution.

There is nothing wrong with that reasoning. In fact, it even instills an indirect popular participation in government. Each and every citizen can, in his or her own little way, prevent the government from exceeding its authority.

But the Second Amendment cannot justify the selling of handguns to people who are not mentally equipped to use them. By imposing a waiting period on the purchase of handguns, society would merely be attempting to reduce the number of avoidable killings.

Those who really want guns will surely find some way to come across them. But that doesn't mean we should sell guns to criminals without making an effort to check their backgrounds.

Granted, people are killed in cars every day. However, an attempt is made through licensing to prevent people who are known to present a risk (whether it be from poor eyesight, drunk driving citations or numerous violations) from being able to drive.

A short waiting period on the purchase of guns would merely give gun salesmen enough time to check on the history of the person wanting to buy a gun.

If that person is proven to be mentally unstable, or has a history of penal conviction, unnecessary deaths could be avoided.

The right to bear arms would remain, and this licensing seems a small compromise to make to actually protect the lawful users of guns, while trying to reduce the tragic incidents where lives are lost because of people who should never have had guns in the first place.

Other Perspectives

I have a dream that someday college students in the state of Idaho may participate in Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s birthday without being penalized for missing classes.

In 1986, every third Monday of January was declared a national holiday in his honor. However, Idaho is one of six states that declined to make it a legal holiday and established a commemorative day instead.

In other words, federal agencies get it off, but state agencies (that's us) don't.

That doesn't explain why several school districts were given the day off, but all seven institutions of "higher" education were not allowed to participate in honoring a stand for civil rights.

Educational changes necessary

Commentary

Barbara Baker
Collegian Columnist

Most students usually enter college with the notion of learning a trade so they can earn big bucks and be successful.

Unfortunately, many educators and administrators tend to foster this notion, too. At a meeting several weeks ago, I heard an instructor say that any student who expressed creativity in his class would fail. After all, to be successful in corporations and industry, you have to be analytical and quantitative.

But what should be remembered is that computers are programmed to perform in an analytical and quantitative manner. Human beings should go beyond just an analytical, programmmed capacity because they possess the abilities to feel, understand, and, if they care to, make a difference.

Education should not only develop skills for a trade and promote success. It should also develop citizenship and a human consciousness in students.

A couple of weeks ago, I was fortunate enough to hear Martin Luther King III speak. He talked about the appeal of his father.

Martin Luther King Jr. was a man of extreme intellect, to the point that he was able to skip grades in school. But, as his son pointed out, this was not what made him a great man.

The elder King was great because he had a global consciousness. He cared about the homeless and people living in poverty. He cared about racism and discrimination.

Randall Robinson also said in his convocation address that students have to get out of Kansas. This was not a put-down of Kansas, but advice to get an education in humanity — advice which more educators and administrators need to provide.

For example, when a student seeks enrollment advising, wouldn't it be just as easy for an adviser to recommend core classes within the American Ethnic Studies or Women's Studies programs as it would be to recommend music listening lab?

Granted, classes in Ethnic Studies and Women's Studies require more classwork and thought, but the perspectives these classes give are much more beneficial to the students because of the diversified people and issues that students will have to face in their future.

It might also be worthwhile for administrators to make certain core classes under the Women's Studies and Ethnic Studies programs required courses instead of electives.

Actually, it might not hurt to require some instructors to go to workshops and seminars that are developed for them. I attended a workshop developed to sensitize instructors to classroom gender issues, and less than half of those in the room were instructors.

When students see instructors not caring about important issues, students may sometimes think, "Why should I care or think that issue is important?"

There are also some advisers of campus clubs and organizations who need to serve as role models instead of passive observers. I've seen this happen, especially in the area of racial issues.

Often the student group may not have the maturity to solve a problem. At that point, an adviser should step in and redirect the flow of the group through educational resources such as books, films, workshops, speakers, or a frank, open discussion.

It might also be helpful if more educators promoted involvement in social groups and government. Whether the involvement be on the local, campus or national level, the awareness created of social issues will be worthwhile. Just voting is not enough.

Whether it be through giving lectures or advising a club, educators should encourage social responsibility and learning.

Education should not serve as a system of hypocrisy, either. I remember hearing all throughout my years of undergraduate studies that in order to be a leader, one has to be assertive, be willing to take the lead, and be bold in one's choices and causes.

But I also noticed what happened when I was bold in my choices and causes. I got the evil eye and was shunned by some educators themselves. In order to be independent and strong and have self-autonomy, students have to be allowed by educators to develop their own choices and causes.

There will never be improvement or change in our society if students are taught and expected to be clones of the status quo or of a particular system of thought.

Play examines stereotypes

Commentary

Sandra Coyner
Guest Columnist

Editor's note: Sandra Coyner is the Director and Associate Professor of Interdisciplinary Studies.

A quick demonstration of the power of gender ideas is the thought experiment in gender reversal. For example, it's common for men to talk about women's bodies in ways that most women would find offensive. Men would laugh it off if women talked this way about them (if women would even do it). But what if men talked about other men this way? Is it offensive or funny or what?

This is tame stuff compared to "Cloud Nine," a thought experiment extravaganza on sex and gender with imperialism, racism and violence thrown in, opening tonight in Nichols Theatre and directed by Kate Anderson.

Imagine, for example, a woman with so little self-worth that she utterly depends on men to give meaning and direction to her life. She might as well be a man. The women's movement coined the term "male-identified" to describe her.

But what if during some extended interaction (like in Act I of the play) she were visibly marked as a man — played by a male actor?

My first thought was: Could he convince the audience? I know femininity is all learned, nothing biological — but it seems to be learned deeply over a long period of time. If a man can portray femininity after a few weeks' study, it is truly shallow. It could be screamingly funny, too.

My second thought, however, is to imagine how I would feel watching a man act out the postures and consequences of subordination to another's will. We all accept this subordination to some extent when a woman plays out "her" role in life. But a man acting feminine is likely to be called a wimp. Will subordination become more obvious? More funny? More unjust?

The first act of this play, which revolves around the central "couple" of the male-identified woman and her totally patriarchal husband, is set in Africa of the British Empire, about 1900. The setting recalls an earlier time when gender roles and male dominance were more rigid and more accepted than now.

It also compares patriarchy with imperialism, and male dominance with white racism. The gender confusion is echoed in the character of a black servant, played by a white actor, who desires to please his white master so much that he participates in the oppression of his own people.

There are other characters, such as two children, including a daughter who is so little valued as a person that she's played by a dummy. There are also a governess, an explorer and two women independent of men, one sexy and one old. These characters introduce various ways of trying to resist the loss of identity involved in giving selfhood up to the rules of patriarchy.

What, for example, happens to a young boy trying to learn this culture? What if he resists? (What if he is played by a female actor?) What happens to him when he betrays himself, as he must in order to participate in the rewards of a patriarchal system that privileges him?

There is a lot of sex in this play because the characters develop many and varied possible sexual unions. There is, for example, the shameless whore, offering her body in return for men's favors. But how much power can a woman get this way when she is categorically powerless?

By giving us cross-gendered actors, the play also makes us ask some questions about "normal" sex. Can a woman who has no identity apart from men ever really love men?

If she's just a mirror of male desires, is this a form of homosexuality? Is the boy's position any different? What is the distinction between obeying fathers, loving them and sleeping with them?

Men's sex looks different in this play, too. When women are held in contempt, ordered around, chastised like children or slaves, what does sex mean between people so unequal? For the man it degenerates to masturbation: autoeroticism, sex with the "doll" he has made and commands.

All this is provocative, but it may seem far away from today. We have figured out this gender bit and we all want equality, right?

Act II brings us to modern times, and the central couple is two young people trying to have an equal, liberated marriage.

They start stereotyped. The woman is actually the grown-up character who was the dummy in Act I. She is passive, but she knows all the modern cliches.

The man genuinely wants her to be "satisfied." Can they be equal? Who will take care of the kids? What if she gets a job offer? Do they have good sex? Can there be such a thing as a feminist man? Can he "give" her equality?

"Cloud Nine" adds to the complexity by throwing in some more stereotypes, mostly gays and children. We have a lesbian who encourages her daughter to play with guns, and a gay man who likes anonymous sex. The children include a girl played by a man and a boy played by a woman. Into this mess walks Betty, the male-identified wife of Act I, a dithery airhead now wanting "liberation," too.

Remarkably, all these characters grow, quickly moving beyond their stereotypes. They come alive for me off the printed page of the script, and they will come vibrantly alive on the Nichols stage. They grow by trying things wildly, improbably outside their stereotypes. They open themselves up to new experiences, heal their wounds and reach out to each other. Even characters from Act I return and are warmed.

My favorite comparison is between "Cloud Nine" and "The Color Purple." Both works start with oppression, painting it so we can see it. Both see exploitive sexuality at the core of patriarchy.

But both Alice Walker and Caryl Churchill, author of "Cloud Nine," turn their characters loose.

See this play. Let yourself go. Let the characters take you on their journey. It will make you a believer in human possibility. We have nothing to lose but some tired, old stereotypes. We have a world of humanity to gain.

Fixx's album gloomy

By Doug Fall
Collegian Reviewer

After two years of silence, The Fixx has released its fifth album, "Calm Animals," and from the sound of it, listeners probably could have used a few more years of silence.

Determined to try a different approach to this album, which is on the RCA label, The Fixx hired producer Bill Wittman (who has worked with the likes of Pat Benatar and The Outfield) and headed to the small Caribbean island of Montserrat. The calm, peaceful atmosphere of the sunny beaches must have gotten to them — the result was a more mellow sound.

Review

The Fixx has been around for nine years, releasing its first single, "Lost Planes," in 1981. From there, the five members — Cy Curnin, Jamie West, Adam Woods, Rupert Greenall, and Dan K. Brown — recorded four albums as well as writing for the "Streets of Fire" soundtrack.

The Fixx has always sung about the tragedies of war and the nuclear age, as in "Red Skies" and "Stand or Fall." Its outlook has changed to a more existential one, though, with songs about individuals and their control, or lack thereof, over their own destiny. The lyrics are a little too deep for simple pop music such as the Fixx's, and the music suffers this time as the lyrics take the forefront.

One glaring problem with the lyrics is the group's choice of subject matter. Instead of writing about realistic problems that concern people today, The Fixx tends to have created a sort of science fiction scenario that reeks with gloom.

The title track, "Calm Animals," provides an excellent metaphor, comparing people to grazing animals, as on the savannas of Africa. The message of the song is that the social codes we have imposed on ourselves have stifled our instinctive awareness of danger and placed us in a precarious position. This has happened so gradually due to greed and the luxuries provided by technology that we are unaware of the "shrinking plains."

Along the same lines of analogy, The Fixx created the song "Cause To Be Alarmed" that is direct in dealing with a modern dilemma. This time the theme is that today's youth and their tomorrows are being wasted due to the fantasy world modern culture has invented in television and entertainment. "No treasure chest, to reinvest, just a bunch of whores. And there is cause, cause to be alarmed."

The one spot where the music surpasses the lyrical content is the track "Precious Stone." This pretty song dances serenely in the midst of more harsh tunes and provides much-needed relief. It would not be surprising if this song were to be released as the first single from this album.

"Driven Out" is the song most likely to fall into The Fixx's tendency toward fantasy. It is set in the future, or perhaps a pessimistic present, with Curnin viewing the world as being hopelessly plundered by thieves, certainly an ecologist's viewpoint. Curnin pleads for a reversal of the hastening trend to self-destruction.

Obviously, The Fixx and Henry David Thoreau would get along well in their philosophies. However, the group makes no attempt to justify its reliance on technology with its electric instrumentation and modern methods of producing music.

With the new album, The Fixx has continued in the same line as the old, changing only slightly after a long break. "Calm Animals" provides nothing new or exciting. A true fan might find insight in the band's socially conscious lyrics, but I'll pass.

Officials fear losing drug fight as crack use spreads to youth

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — As the crack problem grows larger, its victims have become younger. The latest two — an 11-year-old alleged to be a drug courier and a 10-year-old crack dealer — left officials wondering if they're losing the drug fight.

"Crack and drugs are so pervasive that of course it trickles down into the lower grades," said Paul Berczeller, a spokesman for the United Federation of Teachers. "You have young kids used every day as drug runners."

Ginay Marks, a Brooklyn school board activist of 17 years, agreed: "I would say in terms of crack — and we thought heroin was an epidemic — nothing has spread as rapidly among our school children."

The two grade-schoolers, arrested in separate incidents less than three weeks apart, offered examples of both street and school incidents, authorities said.

The 10-year-old was arrested Jan. 15 after police watched him and a 14-year-old partner make a half-dozen crack sales in Wyandanch, Long Island. The 5-foot-tall boy had three $20 vials of crack and $226 cash on him when arrested.

A Family Court judge ruled Wednesday that he had committed the crimes and scheduled sentencing for Feb. 10. The boy faces up to 18 months' detention in a youth facility or two years' probation. Charges against the 14-year-old were pending.

On Tuesday, an 11-year-old boy arrived at his Bronx elementary school carrying what looked like his lunch bag. Inside, school officials found 411 vials of crack, most in 10-packs worth $50 each.

The special education student told police his 17-year-old brother had given him the drugs. A search was on Wednesday for the brother, said police spokesman Officer Hugh Barry.

But the two arrests — particularly the one of a special education student in his school — have other officials wondering if the tide is turning into a tidal wave.

"Are we losing the battle? I think we're in the middle of the battle. But the schools are not immune from the ills of society," Berczeller said.

The 11-year-old faced a Family Court hearing late Wednesday afternoon.

"When an 11-year-old child with special learning needs is exploited as a drug carrier, it reaffirms my belief that drugs are the most serious problem our youth must confront," said Schools Chancellor Richard Green.

Local School Board President Lawrence A. Warden, whose Bronx district includes the school that the 11-year-old attended, said he was "shocked and angry."

"We don't expect that from an 11-year-old youngster. It's like carrying a loaded machine gun in a playground," said Warden.

Board of Education spokesman Robert Terte, saying much of the problem is on the streets around the schools, noted that the number of drug arrests on school property was down in the past year. In 1987, the figure was 114; for 1988, it was 94.

"Remember, you're talking about 180 school days, with nearly 1,000 schools and 940,000 kids," said Terte. "In percentage terms, that's a very small number."

But Berczeller said the increasing drug problem was at least partially responsible for the increase in violence against teachers in the city. For the period Sept. 1 to Dec. 1, 1988, 188 teachers were assaulted; for the same period in 1987, the figure was 119 teachers.

Search for North's jury to begin

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Oliver North was an outlaw to some Americans and a hero to others, but those people won't qualify to sit in judgment of him. The court is looking for jurors who barely heard of him.

A jury of North's peers — the term means a cross-section of his fellow citizens, not necessarily his equals — can be found and can render justice, many legal experts say, even with the exclusion of those who saw North confessing on television that he deceived lawmakers about selling arms to Iran.

"Jurors are asked to bring a certain common sense into the jury room and try to determine whether a particular story makes sense and look witnesses in the eye to tell who is telling the truth," said Philip Lacovara, a former prosecutor in another notorious case, Watergate. "It is not necessary for people to be highly educated or current in world affairs to make that assessment."

Many other legal experts agreed. "It's a burden to find qualified jurors, but I'm not saying it can't be done," says Wayne LaFave of the University of Illinois law faculty.

But some disagree. "I wouldn't want people who lived in Washington, the seat of government, on that jury who were so uninformed," said Bill Moffitt, a well-known criminal defense lawyer.

"Are they going to be interested in what goes on inside the courtroom if they were so uninterested for so long in what went on outside it?"

U.S. District Judge Gerhard A. Gesell said as the trial began that he wanted jurors "ignorant" of North's activities.

Student Senate to discuss allocations

By The Collegian Staff

Student Senate will meet at 7 tonight in the Union Big Eight Room.

Its business will include approval of new members to the Investment Ad Hoc committee, which has three vacancies due to resignations. Last week Senate tabled the appointments because not all of the appointees were present.

Senate will also hear two special allocations requests.

The Student Governing Association will request an allocation to cover various additional costs to bring its budget up to last year's level. The allocation would cover printing costs for new copies of the SGA Constitution and bylaws because of changes made last semester, letters sent to prospective high school students to inform them of K-State's student government, and expenses incurred by the SGA copy machine.

Consumer Relations Board will request an allocation for purchase of a consumer protection book.

Senate will also approve appointees to the cabinet of Student Body President Laurian Cuffy. Approval of appointees to the judicial branch of student government may be added to the agenda.

Senate will also elect a new vice-chairperson. The previous vice-chairman, Greg Weisenborn, resigned last week.

Support for disabled students given by University service

By Ginger Miller
Collegian Reporter

Gretchen Holden, coordinator of services for physically limited students, offers a personal touch to her job, said Tom Leikam, sophomore in journalism and mass communications.

Leikam, who is afflicted with multiple sclerosis, said he was told to see Holden upon his arrival at K-State.

"She made things a lot more accessible to me," Leikam said.

"When I'm in the area, I stop in and talk to her," he said. "She offers a lot of support and a good ear. She's really involved. She has a sincere concern for making this campus accessible to everyone. No matter what the problem, she'll work it out."

Holden said Section 504 of the Federal Rehabilitation Act of 1973 requires reasonable accommodations be made for handicapped people enrolled in programs or activities that receive or benefit from federal assistance.

"Those students are entitled to function in the most integrated fashion possible," she said.

In 1980 the University took steps to accomplish this by establishing the Services for Physically Limited Students.

Remodeling has been done on campus to accommodate the physically limited. Holden said there must be program accessibility, therefore not every building is required to be accessible.

For example, King Hall had to be redesigned for the handicapped because it holds all chemistry labs.

"We're continuing to do medium-sized projects, rather than large renovation," Holden said.

There are three major groups of disabled students: the blind, the deaf and those in wheelchairs, Holden said. There are many other disabilities, including multiple sclerosis, epilepsy, diabetes, or other hearing, visual or physical impairments.

"Blind or visually impaired students need access to the material," Holden said.

The students can be provided with readers, mobility assistance, special assistance with enrollment, and arrangements for exams. Taped textbooks may also be obtained.

Students who are deaf or hearing impaired can be provided with notetakers and interpreters. Holden said if the student knows sign language, an interpreter is especially helpful.

"It has been harder for those students who cannot sign, because they miss so much," she said.

Holden said the fastest growing group of disabled students at K-State is the learning disabled, accounting for 70 to 80 students.

"There has been some question about who defines who is learning disabled," Holden said.

Students who come to Holden must provide verification of their disability. She said most bring verification from their high school system, but if that is unavailable, Holden refers them for testing.

Once the required documentation is provided, Holden asks the students how she can best help them function. The students are provided with reasonable accommodations in various forms.

"Some students just need a little more time to finish an exam, for example," Holden said.

She will meet with a student and instructor to discuss any special needs the student will have.

"Generally people are cooperative, with the right attitude," she said.

The most visible part of the program is the shuttle bus, although Holden said 80 percent of the students using the service are only temporarily disabled.

Leikam uses the service regularly and has high praise for it.

"The shuttle service is phenomenal," Leikam said.

Math program fights odds

By Carol Knorr
Collegian Reporter

K-State's mathematics department is winning the battle against the national trend of low success rates in pre-calculus courses with a program implemented in 1986.

The program, which established open tutorial sessions — a more efficient way of grading homework — and a GTA training program, has helped increase K-State's success rate from 50 percent to 64 percent in three years. The national average is approximately 50 percent.

"The success rate is defined as an A, B or C," said Thomas Muenzenberger, director of undergraduate studies in mathematics. "We are looking at a pretty straightforward comparison. We've had the same faculty for the years we have looked at, and the success rates have risen."

Louis Pigno, head of the mathematics department, said the program helps to remedy the fact that there has been a national trend to reduce faculty participation in lower-level undergraduate math classes.

"Many leading universities do not use faculty (in pre-calculus courses). Instead, they use graduate students and undergraduate students in the form of self-mastery modules," Pigno said.

"Effectively, the students are told to read the book, go to videotape lectures, go to tutorials where they can get assistance with the homework, and the students must pass a certain number of examinations.

"The students are not assigned to any certain professor, and there are no real classes that are met," Pigno said. "We do not have that in pre-calculus at K-State."

The math department makes full use of faculty and graduate students in pre-calculus courses, he said.

"We've kept the best features of our own program and adopted the best of the self-mastery programs and incorporated them into ours," Pigno said.

The pre-calculus programs are coordinated through a departmental office of undergraduate studies which also did not exist three years ago, he said.

The program employs approximately 80 undergraduate students and 50 graduate students who work in the out-of-class tutorials, now provided by the math department, and grade homework assignments so that students get feedback quicker, Pigno said.

"In all the basic services courses, homework is given quite frequently," he said. "This helps drive students to go to help sessions."

Muenzenberger said: "Paper grading is one of the department's biggest programs moneywise, timewise and energywise. Everyone benefits — the students, the instructors and the department."

When paper grading was first initiated in 1986, it was only provided for College Algebra and Calculus I courses.

Now, all of the services courses, including Calculus III, Differential Equations and Matrix Theory, are included in the program.

Next year, Technical Calculus and Form and Impact will be added to the list of courses for which undergraduates and graduate students grade papers, Muenzenberger said.

Graduate students are also used in recitations to support the lecture class.

"Graduate teaching assistants have to go through a very extensive training program one week before classes begin before they enter the classroom," Pigno said.

During the training, students simulate a recitation. The GTAs are videotaped and then reviewed with their assigned teaching adviser.

Approximately 50 percent of the GTAs in the mathematics program are foreign students. Pigno said this rates at the national average for math and science programs.

This does not pose too much of a problem, he said.

"All GTAs from foreign countries must pass a speech exam," Pigno said. "They can't teach unless they score satisfactorily.

"Usually (the students enrolled in pre-calculus classes) get used to the language difference in a couple of weeks. They climatize themselves to the GTA.

"If the student really has a big problem with the language difference, they will usually switch recitation sections."

'Cats fall late to No. 1-ranked Sooners

King hits 20 in second half to lead OU to 8-point win

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

The K-State men's basketball team pushed No. 1-ranked Oklahoma hard for the first 37 minutes of its contest Wednesday night in Bramlage Coliseum, but fell short at the end, 90-82.

Trailing only 44-42 at the half, the Wildcats seemed to have momentum going into the locker room.

"The stretch right before the half was pivotal. We went in down two; we felt pretty good," K-State coach Lon Kruger said. "We realized that we had to go out and generally do the same things we had been doing, and do them a little bit harder.

"Our kids' effort was outstanding. They did the things we asked them to do. Their awareness was good, but during that stretch (at the end of the game), there were a couple of possessions where we relaxed just a little bit, and they made us pay for it."

With 3:24 remaining, Fred McCoy hit a five-foot jump hook to knot the score at 80-80. But Terrence Mullins of Oklahoma hit a three-point shot from the top of the circle just seven seconds later to put the Sooners on top 83-80. The Sooners scored the next five points before K-State answered with two charities from Tony Massop with 13 seconds left to play.

"I was very pleased with the effort of the players. As disappointed as they are, they can keep their heads up and feel good about taking another step."

—Lon Kruger
K-State coach

"The last three minutes are the most important part of the game," said Mullins. "We don't stop doing what we did for the first 37 minutes just because it's tied up with three minutes left. We still have to take it to them and play our game.

"We seem to get tougher defensively and get more aggressive on the boards. That's the way we play in the last three minutes, the toughest part of our game."

Stacey King and Mullins took scoring honors for the Sooners, tallying 27 and 21 points respectively. King, who shot only three of nine from the field and had only seven points in the first half, came back in the second half and hit seven of 10 from the floor to finish with 10 of 19. He also hit 7 of 9 from the free-throw line.

"I was missing a lot of shots that I had been hitting these last few games," King said. "I wasn't getting frustrated with myself. Coach Tubbs and the players said, 'Hey, the shots will go down for you in the second half.' I went one-on-one with their guy in the second half and he couldn't stop me."

LaKeith Humphrey scored 21 points to lead the 'Cats while Fred McCoy and Steve Henson weren't far behind with 18 and 17 respectively. Billy Ray Smith came off the bench to score 10 for the night.

"(In the last three minutes) I had a little jumper down in close that I missed," Henson said. "I wish I would have shot that a little more aggressively. We also had an inbounds play where we didn't have all five people executing, expecting the same thing to happen."

The inbounds play came at a crucial time. With 2:24 left in the game and K-State trailing by 3 points, the Wildcats mishandled an inbounds pass, and Tyrone Jones of the Sooners came up with the ball and hit his only field goal of the night, putting Oklahoma on top by five at 85-80. The Sooner lead was unchallenged the rest of the way.

Free throws were the key to the Wildcats chasing the Sooners for as long as they did. K-State sank 32 of 36 charities to Oklahoma's 22 of 29, keeping the 'Cats close.

"We did a good job at the line," Kruger said. "Everyone stepped up and concentrated well. We did an excellent job at the free-throw line.

"I was very pleased with the effort of the players. As disappointed as they are, they can keep their heads up and feel good about taking another step."

Lady Cats squeeze by Oklahoma

From Staff and Wire Reports

NORMAN, Okla. — Freshman point guard Mary Jo Miller nailed a nine-foot jumper with eight seconds remaining to give the K-State women an 84-83 victory over Oklahoma in Big Eight Conference action Wednesday night at Lloyd Noble Center.

The Lady Cats trailed OU 83-80 with 1:23 left in the contest, but the Lady Sooners were never heard from again, as K-State scored the final four points of the ball game to up its record to 15-5 on the season and 5-2 in Big Eight play.

"This is a very big win for our team for three reasons," Lady Cats' coach Matilda Mossman said. "First, this is the first time in five years that we've beaten them in Norman. Second, it's a road win, and the third thing is that it was a close game."

Perhaps the biggest point Mossman noted was that the win came on the road. Before Saturday's win at Kansas, the Lady Cats had not won a Big Eight road game in nearly two years. Now they have two straight tallies in the win column.

The Lady Cats didn't have to come from behind throughout the contest. With 5:33 remaining, OU went on a three-point binge, and, adding two free throws, the Lady Sooners finally took the lead, 79-78.

But after the Lady Sooners' leading scorer, Jo Mosley, connected on Oklahoma's final basket, the stage was set for Mary Jo Miller's heroics.

K-State's leader in scoring for the third game in a row was Big Eight Player of the Week Kristie Bahner, who had 22 points; while Rita Matteucci had 17; Nadira Hazim, 15; and Diana Miller, 11.

Prior to Wednesday's games, the Lady Cats were tied for second in the Big Eight with Missouri, but, thanks to KU, who knocked off the Lady Tigers Wednesday night, K-State now owns sole possession of second.

Parrish spending time with family, on links

By Scott Paske
Collegian Reporter

A typical day in the life of Stan Parrish is a lot different than it used to be.

Instead of supervising coaching staff meetings, preparing players for an upcoming game or scouring the nation for prospective recruiting talent, the former K-State football coach has devoted time to himself and his family.

"I've been able to spend a lot more time with my family," said Parrish, who still resides in Manhattan. "We've been able to do a little traveling and I'm an avid golfer, so I've been taking advantage of the unseasonable weather."

For Parrish, who resigned in October after a three-year stint with the Wildcats, the off-season agenda has been a far cry from all play and no work. The task of helping his staff members move on has been a major project.

"You feel a certain degree of responsibility to your assistants in this type of situation," Parrish said. "I've spent a lot of time using connections to help them relocate."

Despite what he referred to as a lack of movement in the college coaching ranks this past season, Parrish has had some success placing his staff members.

Kevin Ramsey and Dana Dimel were retained by current K-State coach Bill Snyder, while Dale Steele and Mark Deal landed jobs at East Carolina and Virginia Military Institute, respectively. Parrish said each of his remaining assistants has lined up interviews.

Parrish, who suffered two winless seasons in three years at K-State, has done some job hunting of his own. He refused to comment on specific openings, but did say his future may be decided soon.

"There have been a few openings that I've looked into," Parrish said. "I've tried to leave my options open both in the coaching field and outside of it. There might be a decision in the next two or three weeks."

With his future still uncertain, Parrish said he had no resentment regarding his tenure as the Wildcat head coach.

"I don't have any bad feelings," he said. "Budgetarily, I think the new staff inherited a better situation, but that comes with a strong commitment to being successful.

"As far as the team is concerned, I think the personnel, particularly the young kids, are better than when we came in. They became a lot stronger in the disciplinary sense. I think they have the tools to be a much improved football team next year."

Parrish has a 10-year record of 57-41-3 as a collegiate head coach and, counting his three years at the high school level, has an overall record of 77-50-3.

Mizzou tops KU; Tar Heels lose

From Staff and Wire Reports

Three teams from the Associated Press' weekly Top 20 poll suffered losses Wednesday night. Here is a brief recap:

In Lawrence, fifth-ranked Missouri downed Kansas 91-66 in a Big Eight game.

"Every time I come up here to play I really want to do what it takes to win," said Missouri guard Lee Coward, who two years ago twice beat Kansas with last-second shots when he was a freshman.

Kansas, 16-5 and 3-3, was frustrated in its second straight try to get the 1,400th win of its history. The Jayhawks will join Kentucky and North Carolina as the only NCAA schools with 1,400 wins.

Coward was taken out of the game by Coach Norm Stewart almost immediately after the start after making a bad pass.

"We had to penalty box him," Stewart said. "He's still got to have a little better judgment. But Lee is a competitor. After the second penalty box he came in and played well."

Kansas coach Roy Williams said the Tigers' three-guard offense of Coward, Byron Irvin and Anthony Peeler was too much. Irvin led the team with 22 points and Peeler had 15.

"They were too athletic for us at times, especially with three guards in the lineup," said Williams, whose team fell out of the Top 20 this week after a loss at home to K-State.

"We did have matchup problems with them. We just didn't do a good job in the second half. They got a run going and we just couldn't do anything about it."

Missouri, 19-3 overall and 5-0 in the Big Eight, won at Kansas for the first time since Jan. 26, 1983. The Tigers had lost five straight since.

At Clemson, S.C., Kirkland Howling made a three-point shot and two free throws in the final minute as Clemson stunned No. 3 North Carolina 85-82 in an Atlantic Coast Conference basketball game.

The victory was the just the second for the Tigers over the Tar Heels in the last 20 meetings and the first since 1985.

North Carolina led 82-80 on a pair of free throws by J.R. Reid with 1:21 left but Howling's 3-pointer with 53 seconds remaining gave the Tigers a one-point lead. After a North Carolina miss, Howling was fouled and hit both ends of a one-and-one with 24 seconds left.

The Tar Heels turned the ball over on their next possession without getting a shot off and missed a desperation shot at the buzzer.

At Landover, Md., freshman Alonzo Mourning scored 17 points and ignited a second-half surge that enabled sixth-ranked Georgetown to solidify its hold on first place in the Big East Conference with a 74-66 victory over No. 10 Seton Hall.

Georgetown led 40-39 when Mourning made a driving layup over Ramon Ramos. The basket started a 9-2 run that gave the Hoyas a 49-41 lead with 9:09 left and Seton Hall never got closer than three points thereafter.

Georgetown made 14 free throws in the final 3:04, including five by Anthony Allen.

Charles Smith scored 18 points for Georgetown.

Curfew eased in Soviet republic despite high ethnic tensions

By The Associated Press

YEREVAN, U.S.S.R. — Authorities eased a curfew here Wednesday, but ethnic tensions remain high in this republic that was the site of mass demonstrations before being hit by a devastating earthquake in December.

The military commander in Yerevan, in an announcement published in the daily newspaper Kommunist, said the midnight-to-6 a.m. curfew would be reduced further to 1 a.m. to 5 a.m.

The decision was made "considering the stabilization of the situation in the capital and regions of the republic during the past month, the participation of citizens in supporting public order and requests of residents," the newspaper said.

A government commission called for speeding up construction to clear the debris and build new housing in northwestern regions of the republic stricken by the Dec. 7 earthquake, which killed an estimated 25,000 people and left a half million homeless. The commission complained the organizations involved in reconstruction are bickering among themselves and making little progress.

Also on Wednesday, the Rev. Jesse Jackson visited Armenian leaders in a tour he said would help him determine what further aid can be provided.

The curfew in Yerevan was imposed in November after at least 30 people were killed in ethnic rioting in Armenia and the neighboring republic of Azerbaijan.

The streets of the Armenian capital, which a few weeks ago were dotted with tanks, armored personal carriers and Interior Ministry troops, were comparatively demilitarized this week.

Only a handful of soldiers and one armored personnel carrier were visible on Opera Square, the site of street protests last year. In the most recent violence, the square was surrounded by troops and military vehicles.

On Lenin Square, there were no tanks, although six armored personnel carriers and a handful of troops were deployed at main government buildings.

Armenian refugees from the violence in Azerbaijan gathered Wednesday, as they have for several weeks, outside the Agriculture Committee offices to discuss their fate. Soviet authorities say about 300,000 people — Armenians who were living in Azerbaijan and Azerbaijanis from Armenia — have fled to their ancestral republics.

Since February 1988, residents of the predominantly Armenian region of Nagorno-Karabakh in Azerbaijan have been agitating to be made part of the republic of Armenia. Armenians are predominantly Christian, while Azerbaijanis are predominantly Moslem.

People in a crowd of about 100 refugees said the government is refusing to give them jobs or homes.

"I consider that it's better to die here in Yerevan than to try to live there," said Gena Agabekyan, an ethnic Armenian who fled the Azerbaijan capital of Baku.

Cold front brings bitter reality

By The Associated Press

The Alaska-born blast of cold air that struck like a hammer blow to the balmy Lower 48 pushed southward and eastward Wednesday, stretching the big chill from the Pacific to Oklahoma to the Great Lakes.

"February is going to be quite different from January," said Bob Snider, a meteorologist at the National Weather Service in Ann Arbor, Mich.

Midwesterners who chuckled at the weather in Alaska over the weekend while polishing their golf clubs got their comeuppance as winter set in with a vengeance. Folks in the normally rainy Pacific Northwest coped with a rare snowfall, and Easterners counted the waning hours of springlike weather as the cold front moved their way.

As the cold pushed into the country Wednesday, temperatures fell 18 degrees in one hour at Ardmore, Okla., the National Weather Service said. Russell, Kan., which shared the nation's high of 84 degrees Tuesday afternoon, had readings in the lower teens a day later and wind chills in the 30-below-zero range.

Not counting Alaska, Cut Bank, Mont., was the nation's icebox at midday Wednesday, with a reading of 31 below zero, and temperatures in the state were forecast to dip below 40 below by Thursday morning. Electric power in Great Falls, a city of 57,000, and several smaller towns in north-central Montana was knocked out for nearly an hour Wednesday morning when the Black Eagle hydroelectric dam broke down.

"We don't know what caused it," said Cort Freeman, Montana Power Co. spokesman. "There's a lot of things that can happen in weather like this."

In Alaska, where it all began as the thermometer went as low as 60 below over the weekend, temperatures moderated Wednesday over much of the state except for the area near the Canadian border. While Anchorage was reporting just 11 degrees below zero and no wind, Northway on the Alaska Highway near the Yukon had a 7 a.m. reading of 59 below.

Northway posted an extreme of another sort when the barometric pressure reached 31.85 inches.

Artist to discuss her work

By The Collegian Staff

Artist Susan Puelz, whose landscape paintings are on display in the Union Art Gallery, will present a lecture and slide show at 7 tonight in the Union Flint Hills room.

Puelz said the slide presentation of pastels and watercolors is more than just a showcase of her art.

"It's about me, my life and where I work," she said. "It also includes the work of some of the artists who have inspired me." Puelz said she will answer questions from the audience following her hour-long presentation.

A native of Lincoln, Neb., Puelz said most of her artwork is of landscapes because she loves the outdoors and its feeling of endlessness. Its constant changes are forever presenting new color combinations and compositions, she said.

"You can't paint a landscape you aren't emotionally attached to," she said. "I have to paint things that have a special meaning to me."

"It's about me, my life and where I work."
—Susan Puelz landscape artist

The artist has a bachelor's in art and a master's in painting, both from the University of Nebraska. She is a visiting assistant professor there and has been a guest lecturer at several universities and community colleges in the area.

Puelz has won a variety of awards and prizes for her artwork, the most recent being the Watercolor U.S.A. Springfield Art Museum Purchase Award and catalog cover in Springfield, Mo. In 1986 she received the Mid-America Arts Alliance and National Endowment for the Arts Fellowship Award in Painting.

She said the publicity involved with the fellowship, including having her work published in The Artist's Magazine, an international magazine, gave a big boost to her career.

Tonight's slide show is free. It is sponsored by The Union Program Council Arts Committee.

Art course involves problem solving

By Mary Ubel
Collegian Reporter

The art of drawing has history and consistency, especially when it comes to drawing the human form — the nude.

"Human figure drawing has been in the world of art ever since we have had art," said Duane Noblett, associate professor of art.

"Figure drawing is a problem-solving course dealing with shape and proportion," Noblett said. "It is one of many steps it takes to make a better artist."

It assists the artists in improving their ability to record what is seen by improving hand and eye coordination, he said.

"The human figure is the hardest to draw — it moves," he said.

Students complete many assignments which are drawn quickly. They don't think about the subject beyond the visual sense, Noblett said.

The goal of the class is to teach students to draw what they see and capture their interpretation on paper, he said.

"Drawing figures must be continued on a regular basis or one can begin to lose sensitivity," Noblett said. "(The artist) sharpens skills by working from figures. If the figure is not drawn correctly, it's very obvious."

The students draw nude models to gain an understanding of shape and proportion of the subject matter.

"If the department could afford an elephant, it could basically create the same idea," Noblett said. "(An elephant) is living matter."

The human figure is relatively consistent, he said. If the models were clothed, it would not display contrast of the figure because clothing wrinkles. The student could draw anything.

"Good models must be aware of art and its difficulty," Noblett said. Models do quick poses, about 30 seconds long, in which they portray athletic events to show movement.

Kristin Tan, senior in graphic design said, "The models do enjoy art. Some may do it for money, but they're not paid that much."

Tan said she has recognized one of the models on campus, and she couldn't say hello.

"I'm too shy," she said.

The models aren't body builders or anything like that; they're just people who have an interest in art, she said.

Noblett said more than half of the models are male, which tends to only give the students a view of drawing a muscle structure and square stature. Female models allow the students to view a completly different vision, one which is more flowing.

In Manhattan it is very hard to find models, he said.

"It has a lot to do with the population of the community," he said, adding that in larger communities, people make their living modeling for figure drawing assignments.

The drawings by the artists are submitted in portfolios for scholarships. Because of the difficulty involved in drawing a live and moving subject, the drawings are used to gauge the student's ability to draw.

"I enjoy drawing the figure. It's just another way to express yourself," said Amy Ryan, senior in graphic design.

The models are very confident, and the students lose their shyness because the models aren't shy, Ryan said.

"Apparently, (the models) appreciate their bodies because they allow us to draw them," Ryan said.

Stress linked to various illnesses

By Carol Knorr
Collegian Reporter

K-State researchers are adding to the pool of evidence that links stress to a variety of illnesses.

"Quick-Mini Stress-Management Strategies for Work, Home, Leisure" says that people who study the body's reaction to stress estimate that physical reactions to the nonphysical threatening events in our lives happen as many as 50 to 200 times a day.

"Stress-Management Strategies" was written by David Danskin, staff member with the University Counseling Center.

The body reacts to nonphysical situations in a similar manner as physical threat. Frequent nonphysical threats can lead to tension headaches, insomnia, ulcers, high blood pressure and heart attacks, as well as other stress-related problems, Danskin said.

If stress causes a person's muscles to become tense, blood pressure to rise, hands and feet to become cold and heart rate to be higher than necessary, the body is responding with inappropriate physical fight-or-flight responses to a nonphysical threat, he said.

"Stress is a product of the mind," Danskin said. "It is not the situation that causes stress, but rather the way people respond to the situation."

The Division of Biology has conducted research in order to find chemical reasons relating stress to illness.

Terry Johnson, director of the Division of Biology, said researchers at K-State are interested in knowing if there is a link between neuropeptides — hormones that are associated with the central nervous system — and activation of viruses present in the central nervous system.

Johnson said the body harbors many viruses which never affect the body unless a stimulus causes chemicals to attack the virus.

Stress can increase the level of neuropeptides in the body, he said. Research has proven viruses can be activated when the level of neuropeptides increases.

"In general, stress, fear and emotional changes not only affect a person mentally, but also physically through chemical changes," Johnson said.

Johnson and Danskin agree that each individual has a different level of tolerance for stress.

"Each person has a different level of tolerance," Johnson said. "It could be individual acceptance, or it may be a chemical difference (in the person's body)."

Danskin said stress doesn't always have negative effects on the body's system. Stress can help people avoid dangerous situations by acting as an early warning sign.

"It is unrelenting stress that causes the imbalance of chemicals in the body," Johnson said.

Danskin said, "We are going to react; that's part of living. But to keep the average level (of stress) within reason, we need to counteract the excessive stress several times a day. That is, as stress begins to build during the day, we need to do something to bring it back down quickly."

Ellen Sinclair, senior in premedicine, said she was sick during the first four weeks of the fall semester and blames it on stress. Now she handles stress by organizing her time.

"If I'm feeling stressed out, I try to figure out what's causing the stress," Sinclair said. "If it was something I was putting off, I do it. Stress is conquerable."

Larry Finley, senior in milling science and management, said a positive mental attitude, exercise and setting priorities every day are the ways he handles stress.

"As a general rule, I don't let things get to the point where they bother me," Finley said. "If something is really bothering me, I'll put it off until later when I'm mentally prepared to deal with it."

He said he does not allow test taking to become an anxiety. He attempts to relax the night before and never studies the day of the test.

There are a multitude of ways to deal with stress, and according to American Health magazine, laughter may still be the best medicine.

"When laughter bursts, your meta-

"When laughter bursts, your metabolism picks up, muscles get massaged and neurochemicals stream into the blood. You feel relaxed — you've raised your guard against depression, heart disease and pain," as was stated in the article.

Sinclair said everyone must find an individual way of dealing with stress, but it can be done.

Fitness programs open at Rec Complex

By Ginger Miller
Collegian Reporter

Karen Loeffler may be able to help anyone who made a new year's resolution to keep fit.

Loeffler, graduate student in foods and nutrition, is the health and fitness coordinator at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. The service is offered free to anyone who is eligible to use the facility.

"We're seeing more people requesting that type of service," said Raydon Robel, director of the complex. "Loeffler has been kept very busy to this point. If interest continues, we'll look to see what the next step is."

"Last semester the biggest drawing was from those who wanted to lose weight," Loeffler said.

Nutrition advice and information on an appropriate exercise program are available, she said.

"Basically, we try to find out what they want out of a program," Loeffler said. "Then we look at what activities they're interested in."

A fitness assessment is required before beginning an exercise program, she said. A medical information sheet is necessary before she makes any recommendations. Anyone appearing to be at risk is referred to a doctor.

Loeffler said there are five components of fitness tested in the assessment: cardiorespiratory endurance, body composition, muscular endurance, flexibility and muscular strength.

"Entry and exit heart rate and blood pressure are taken with the fitness assessment," she said.

Fitness and body composition assessments are given to anyone interested, not just to those wanting to devise an exercise program, Loeffler said.

The most beneficial procedure is to have a body composition assessment followed by another one after a few months of regular exercise to determine what changes have occurred, she said.

Another of her job requirements is to be available 10 to 12 hours each week to meet with and advise people.

Before Loeffler was hired last semester, Robel said the position was more of an intern program through the Department of Foods and Nutrition. In the intern program, students would work only a few hours a week.

Some of Loeffler's other duties include writing a column in the monthly Rec Report newsletter, giving blood pressure checks, giving programs for living groups on campus, teaching CPR classes, and helping interview and select aerobics instructors.

She said about 50 percent of the people who use the services are students. Overall, more women come in than men.

Loeffler graduated under the dual degree program of nutrition and exercise science. After receiving her master's in foods and nutrition, she plans to become certified as a registered dietician and an exercise specialist.

two years of MOE.

■ Funding improvements including MOE must not only be sustained, but further enhanced through fiscal year 1991.

■ Any Washburn financing plan should include a permanent municipal mill levy that will provide for the university's debt service on existing facilities, and for major maintenance, repair and renovation.

■ No conditions should be attached to Washburn's affiliation that would infringe on the regents' authority to organize, manage and control the university.

Richard Dodderidge, chairman of the Board of Regents, said these conditions must be met to ensure the existing regents schools some financial security, adding, "the board has no authority over what is decided in the Legislature."

Opponents of the proposal have also argued that Kansas doesn't need another regents law school, and Washburn won't offer the state any programs not already available.

Washburn isn't the only Kansas university with financial troubles: Marymount College in Salina recently announced it is closing at the end of the spring semester.

Ray Hauke, director of planning and budget for the Board of Regents, said Marymount and Washburn are two different situations.

"Historically, most of the municipal universities have become regents universities one by one," Hauke said. "Marymount isn't municipally funded, and wouldn't have support to be affiliated with the state."

Hauke said Wichita State University had been a municipal university until 1963, when it was accepted into the regents system.

But Washburn is not yet deep in debt. Jeanne Hoferer, assistant to the president of Washburn, said the university has only one outstanding source of debt for the Petro Allied Health Center on the campus. That debt is scheduled to be paid off by 1995.

If the Legislature passes Hayden's proposal, Washburn's tuition would be "frozen" until it was approximately the same as the other regents institutions. Hauke said due to natural inflation and other factors, existing regents schools' tuitions are likely to rise slightly.

Tuition at Washburn is $70 per credit hour, which is considerably higher than the tuition at regents schools. Students at K-State, the University of Kansas, and Wichita State University pay an average of $37 per in-state undergraduate credit hour. The four other regents schools pay a lesser amount, Hauke said.

Consideration of a bill to make Washburn a regents school is likely to be introduced in March or April.

Washburn sentiment mixed

Students fear cutbacks

By Chris Koger
Staff Writer

The possible entry of Washburn University into the Kansas Board of Regents system has stirred some mixed feelings within Washburn students.

Charles Miller, chief of staff of Washburn's student government executive board, said his impression is that many students haven't decided whether or not to support Hayden's proposal.

Some students are opposed to the plan because they are afraid that the information they are getting from the Washburn administration is biased, Miller said.

"Some are afraid to buy into the idea because they fear the law school and other programs would get cut back, and they don't want any funding to be cut out of the university budget," he said.

Steve Christian, Washburn student body vice-president, said he believes there are many untruths circulating about effects the university's state affiliation might have on existing regents schools.

Christian said he has found that a majority of students are misinformed about the issue.

"We're mainly dealing with students who don't have an opinion on it because they aren't knowledgeable about it," he said.

Anthony Bryan, junior in social work, said he was uncertain how Washburn would be affected.

"I don't know what changes would be made, or the benefits of bringing the university into the state system," Bryan said.

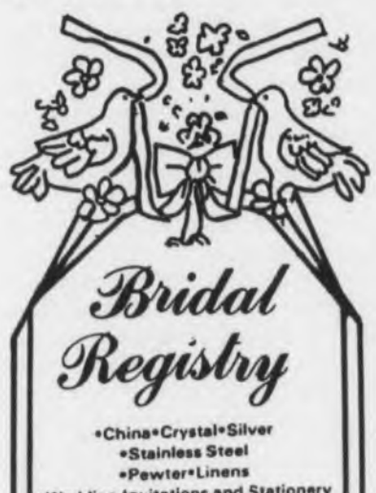
Several Washburn students said they would support Washburn as a state university.

"I'm for it, just for the fact that our tuition goes up every year, and the state schools basically have the same tuition," said Patty Donovan, junior in accounting.

"I think students at K-State and Washburn are getting the same quality education, but less students are going to (Washburn) because they can't afford it," Donovan said.

Kim Kastman, junior in social work, agreed.

"Although it's nice to be a one-of-a-kind university, I think it would be good to know the university will have more money as a state school," she said.



Staff/Steve Wolgast

A bell tower stands in front of Washburn University's Mabee Library. The Kansas Legislature will decide whether Washburn will be included in the state's regents system.

Film as art medium explored

Class on western movies addresses cultural values

By Kevin Kramer
Staff Writer

Some students' dreams of a college course that encourages them to read fiction and watch videos of classic movies has become a reality.

K-State's Division of Continuing Education is offering a telenet course that focuses on Western fiction and how it is turned into film, by the use of commercially available videos.

"The class, Fiction into Film: The Western, is designed to primarily address high school seniors as an honors symposium," said Richard McGhee, professor of English and course instructor. "It is the combination of telenet class sessions, live audio teleconferencing to 37 locations in Kansas, with available film videos."

This course could not have been taught a few years ago, McGhee said. However, the influx of video stores into communities has made available the films used for this type of class.

He said he hopes someday to offer this type of course to University students. This course is modeled after Fiction and Film, a course offered on campus which studies more than one general theme, he said.

"I'm ready to consider this use of videos for a course on campus because of the access of film's technology," McGhee said. "I would rather treat film time like the required reading in textbooks.

"We, as instructors in literature, should understand that students are more familiar with the art of film than the art of literature. It is one of the conditioned environmental forces that students bring to class."

He said he feels there is more complexity in the experience of watching film than in the reading experience.

"Western film has a lot of richness (compared with) its written form," he said.

Western film is an expression of culture and how that culture intellectually plays with one's perception, McGhee said.

"The course is a study of the way films work on our imagination — the subtle impact that occurs without the viewer realization," McGhee said.

"The illustration of film reflects the period of time in which they are made," he said. "Movies move with politics and social ideologies of the times.

"It is important that we study TV and film as an art medium in a democratic society, where it is more influential than the written word. It has taken the place of the literary experience."

Film combines the two challenges of a constant text and the popular performance of theater, he said. The class explores the special way film tells a story, as opposed to print.

Peg Wherry, telecourse coordinator for the Division of Continuing Education, said, "The Western film is a vital part of American popular culture. This course will enhance students' awareness of these films as cultural artifacts and will help them understand how literature is used in filmmaking."

McGhee said some University courses teach how to make a film. This class, though, moves from the technical study to the transition of film content.

"The study of film is a learning experience on how the camera angle or focus makes the viewer feel or see in symbolic images of life," he said. "(It is) the articulation of what the film is doing to the viewer when one is watching it."

The University should have more courses on film, McGhee said. But the bureaucratic machine and the division of academic territory are discouraging it, he said, adding that various departments of the University like to teach film from their own perspectives.

He said the focus of study in the class is the art of cinematic techniques and the Western themes of rugged individualism, mysterious strangers, romantic attachments, the gang, and law and order.

"The idea of the Western is not special to American culture," McGhee said. "It is the nearest thing we have as a culture to mythology."

Western mythical culture arose with settlers moving west and challenging new frontiers, McGhee said. The origin of this culture is older than American culture. The theme is a rebirth of ancient stories placed into an American context.

"Those ancient ties are why the Western has such an appeal ... in other cultures," he said. "The Italians have been fascinated by the American Western.

The Japanese film director Akira Kurosawa created one of the best and powerful renditions of the American Western — "The Seven Samurai" — in 1956, McGhee said.

handicaps are gone, and they can be almost like normal kids."

Layne said the class, which is required for physical education majors, is beneficial to both the children and the college students.

"It is good hands-on experience for the students, and the individual attention and change in routine are good for the kids. It's something for them to look forward to," he said.

Nancy Brown, Lee School teacher, has students in her class who are part of the program. She said learning about the water is important for those with impairments.

"Water is part of everyone's life with swimming pools in a lot of neighborhoods and Tuttle Creek so near," Brown said. "It's important for the kids to know about what happens in the water — how they relate to it."

Layne welcomes volunteers who are willing to work with the children. Individuals who haven't worked with handicapped people in the past should not feel apprehensive, he said.

"Someone with interest is what we need," Layne said. "We want people who care. We have the ability to teach them what they need to know."

After 45 minutes in the pool, the children were helped out of the water. Some were eased back into wheelchairs adjacent to the pool which had sat empty while their occupants moved freely in the water.

In a small room with mats on the floor, the students helped the children dry off and dress so they could return to their schools.

Each student took a moment to make eye contact and tell the children they would see them next week, and then moved to the dressing rooms to prepare for their own classes.

Kristi Broadfoot, senior in exercise science and nutrition, paused for a moment before the children left.

"Too many people shy away from kids like these," she said. "They're kids, too; they're just special kids."

until the windfall is returned to the taxpayers of Kansas."

Hayden said he is willing to veto entire spending bills until he gets a suitable tax bill.

In other action Wednesday:

■ The Senate unanimously approved and sent to the House a bill that would allow the Wichita area to have another exit on the Kansas Turnpike and a measure to allow "support" dogs, which open doors and pull wheelchairs for the disabled, to enter public places, such as restaurants and motels.

■ Spokesmen for Kansas industries testified before the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee in favor of two bills they said would encourage economic development. One would repeal the alternative minimum tax on corporations, and another would reduce corporate tax rates.

■ The chairman of the state Board of Tax Appeals told the House Taxation Committee that the different methods counties are using to tax mineral rights are unconstitutional and will have to be changed.

■ Opponents to a bill that would not allow cities to ban group homes for the mentally ill from residential areas told the Senate Local Government Committee that the measure is an encroachment on local ordinances.

■ A proposal to require all counties to have community corrections programs received mixed reviews in a hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

■ State money is needed to help with summer school programs so marginal students can develop skills that will help them keep up with their peers, educators told the Senate Ways and Means Committee.

Councils act as liasions to administration

By Angie Smith
Collegian Reporter

Imagine a president without a cabinet. Now imagine a college without a council. Many sometimes wonder if the nine college councils are necessary.

Willard Nelson, dean of the College of Education, believes the council is very helpful.

"The college council of education is a very essential group. We have learned to rely on our council for a number of activities," Nelson said.

Tom Hemmer, college council coordinator, said the general responsibilities of the councils include approving Student Goverment Association constitution revisions, allocating money to clubs in their colleges, assisting in picking the student of the month from the college, sending out monthly newsletters, assisting telefunds and helping with K-State's open house.

"These are the main responsibilities, however, each council decides amongst itself what exactly it is going to do," he said.

Nelson said the College of Education council consists of 15 elected members.

"Representatives from other majors such as physical education, music education, human ecology, etc., are encouraged to attend the council meetings also," he said.

Input from these liaisons assists in the council's success, Nelson said.

Melanie Mainquist, president of the College of Agriculture council, said the council is definitely needed.

"The College of Agriculture council is one of the most active councils on campus," she said. "We work with not only our council, but also with K-State, and prospective students at FFA and 4-H days on campus.

"We sponsor Ag Science Day and Ag Career Day, both of which we elect directors for. Directors are in charge of recruiting students in every major," Mainquist said.

William Feyerharm, associate dean of the College of Arts and Science, said the councils are necessary but there is room for improvement.

"I think the councils could play a greater role by inputting more on teacher and dean issues," he said.

Lead paint causes problem at child center

Staff/Greg Vogel

Children at the KSU Child Development Center play on a table covered with paint containing excessive amounts of lead. About $25,000 of the furniture must be replaced because the lead content exceeds a federally mandated .06 percent limit.

By Karen Allen
Staff Writer

© Student Publications Inc. 1989

Paint used at K-State has been discovered by Industrial Hygienist Steven Galitzer to contain dangerous levels of lead normally banned by federal mandate.

In November 1988, after comparing inventory paint lists of University painters with the paint's Material Safety Data Sheets, Galitzer said he realized more than a dozen of the paints manufactured by the Kansas Correctional Industries and used by K-State, contain lead above the .06 percent maximum level allowed by a 1976 ruling of the Consumer Product Safety Commission.

"Up until this point, we had no idea we were working with leaded materials," he said.

Red, yellow and blue industrial paints containing lead contents higher than the federally mandated limit have been used on the furniture at the KSU Child Development Center.

Although the yellow paint met CPSC standards with a lead-drier (a liquid added to reduce drying time) content of .06 percent, the blue showed a lead-drier content of .14 percent.

According to the Material Safety Data Sheets published by the manufacturer, the red paint contains a lead-drier content of .06 percent, but shows a lead molybdate chromate (an added pigment) of 17 percent that places the total lead content above .06 percent.

Besides children at the center being exposed to the paint, which is toxic when eaten, Galitzer said painters have not been wearing proper safety gear while sandblasting because they assumed the paint met the CPSC standard.

However, the ruling affects paint produced by companies engaged in interstate commerce, not intrastate commerce. KCI, which provides all state agencies with industrial supplies, is not covered by the ruling because it only transacts within the State of Kansas.

Gene Wiley, physical plant supervisor for the Department of Housing, said he, too, believed the paint was lead-free.

The paint had no label identifying it as containing lead, Wiley said.

Galitzer made his discovery while attempting to reduce the University's budget for the disposal of hazardous wastes.

He discovered the paint's contents when he began processes to dispose of solids from oil-based paints in August. Oil-based paint, unlike latex, has a solvent containing lead or chromium which makes it a hazardous waste.

A drying agent added to the paint evaporates the solvent. The paint solids can, in all likelihood, be buried in

Paint found to contain excess lead

The KSU Child Development Center is facing another hardship due to the need to replace about $25,000 worth of furniture covered with paint, containing more than the legal limit of lead.

It will be more economical to throw out and rebuild the furniture than to sand and repaint it, said Ann Hawks, assistant director of the center.

However, the paint must be replaced because its lead content exceeds .06 percent, which in 1976, the Consumer Product Safety Commission set as the legal limit for paint in situations such as child care centers.

The red, yellow and blue paints were being used because they were "bright, vibrant and add a lot of visual," said Nancy Bolsen, center director. "They gave the center a sense of wholeness and unity."

Bolsen said she was "concerned, upset, and disillusioned," upon hearing the furniture's paint contained lead.

"It's detrimental to the center," Bolsen said. "We were informed at a time when we don't have a lot of money to replace all (the furniture)."

In 1987, the center spent about $17,000 on furniture. Much of which was repainted. Additional pieces were built and painted last summer

Goal set for Essential Edge plan

By Nancy Prosser
Staff Writer

K-State's administrators and members of the KSU Foundation are working together to create a capital funds campaign, Essential Edge, which they hope will raise as much as $100 million in the next seven years.

The campaign is a drive to collect money from all available sources, including corporations, foundations and alumni, said James Richardson, president of Community Service Bureau Inc., the firm that conducted the initial survey on donor interest in the project.

Organizers expect to raise $10 million to $12 million per year during the next five to seven years, their ultimate goal being $100 million, said Arthur Loub, president of the Foundation. The campaign has been in the planning stages for the past three years.

"Two to three years ago, we phased out of the Bramlage Coliseum campaign and we knew that there were a number of unmet needs on campus," Loub said.

"The campaign is kicking off its internal drive this month," Richardson said. "It is in its 'quiet phase,' meaning that we are trying to contact potential donors, inform them about the campaign and its goals and objectives."

Each college within the University developed its own priority and needs list. From those lists, the Foundation developed a statement of needs for the University. This document synthesizes the detailed reasons for support of the capital funds campaign.

"We did a feasibility study of 168 people. Of those, 67 percent expressed a willingness to give to the fund at this time," Richardson said.

Loub said those involved in the study were people who have been generous donaters to the University in the past and have a firm commitment to K-State.

When the Bureau did the donor survey, it asked recipients to prioritize the areas they believed needed funding, Richardson said.

"The three areas that were named as priorities were faculty support, student scholarships and facility needs on campus, which would include the development of an art museum on campus," Loub said. "We are the only institution in the Big Eight or Big Ten that does not have an art museum."

Support for K-State faculty would be provided through professorships and distinguished professorships, he said. The campaign would provide money for scholarships designed to help students.

"We saw a need for flexibility in student scholarship support on campus, especially to attract students with American Collegiate Testing scores in the 22-28 range," Loub said.

A representative from Richardson's company will be on campus during the initial phases of the project; however, the permanent director of the campaign will be Mark Moore, Foundation vice president for major gifts.

Bramlage must pay for cancelled band

By Nancy Hill
City Editor

Although the Metallica concert scheduled for Jan. 29 in Bramlage Coliseum was cancelled, about $30,000 will be paid to the band and their promoter, said Charlie Thomas, coliseum director.

A $24,000 guarantee and about $5,000 in advertising and production costs must be paid, even though the group will never play at K-State, Thomas said.

Low ticket sales prompted the concert's cancellation when only 1,075 seats of a 13,500-seat capacity sold.

"It was my decision to cancel," Thomas said. "You can never be sure of your decision, but I knew I had all of those empty seats.

"I have to look at it from a common sense point — financially and also how the building is going to look. I don't expect to make money off of every show," he said.

Bramlage events, other than basketball games, have produced combined profits between $55,000 and $60,000 since the opening of the coliseum.

"Right now it's hard to get a handle on how much it takes to run the facility — we don't have a track record," Thomas said. "We will make enough on our events to keep our heads above water."

Overall, he said Metallica has had an "up and down" tour in other parts of the United States.

"We're not in the crossroads of the world. This has forced us to be a lot more aggressive and has forced us into the position of the promoter," Thomas said. "It puts us at the same risk as any promoter; we simply took a chance."

Thomas said he did receive about 20 letters and a few phone calls from people opposing the performance of Metallica; however, this was not a factor in the cancellation.

"The majority (of the calls and letters) were from people who had never been to a rock show," Thomas said. "They had very little understanding of what actually goes on during a rock concert.

"We don't force anyone to come into the arena. So much (of the opposition) starts on rumor and from sensationalism. I'm not going to bring anything in here that's going to break local laws."

Thomas said he hasn't been pressured by administrators or the athletic department concerning the programming at Bramlage.

"Steve (Miller, athletic director) is extremely good to work with. He understands the value of having a multi-purpose building," Thomas said. "Everytime you bring something in here, it benefits everyone."

In addition, the facility is another recruiting tool for the University. It has the ability to bring in entertainment and provides something different for students to do, he said.

Thomas said the Kansas Expocentre in Topeka was willing to take the Metallica concert when the Bramlage appearance was cancelled, but Metallica management didn't want to move.

"I felt that there were people in this community that would want to see Metallica," said Steven Rosenblatt, executive manager of the Expocentre.

Rosenblatt said he had also been Investment committee members approved

Student Senate

By Nancy Prosser
Staff Writer

Student Senate Thursday approved the appointment of two at-large members to the Investment Ad Hoc Committee on ethical investments in South Africa.

After tabling the motion due to the abscence of the appointees last week, Senate approved Leroy Clare, senior in medical technology, and Kenny Kincaid, senior in mathematics, to the committee.

"Attention has been focused on South Africa because of institutional racism," Clare said. "Apartheid is legalized racism in its most brutal form."

"The committee should be a group of people coming together with solid facts to make a wise decision about investments in South Africa," Kincaid said. "We have an obligation to know who we support with our funds."

Before the approval of the appointees, debate focused on the lack of advertising of the committee's openings.

"There was not an opportunity given to all students for a chance to apply for the openings on the committee," said Travis Stumpff, arts and sciences senator. "(The appointees) were pre-determined from a chosen few. I feel we need to put these committee openings in the Collegian and advertise them."

"I disagree with the positions not being advertised," said Lauren O'Connor, Senate Finance Committee chairwoman. "But I don't think if they would have been advertised there would be a different group of people in front of you."

Senate chose a new vice-chairman to replace Greg Weisenborn, engineering senator, who resigned last week. Doug Holley, arts and sciences senator, was sworn in as the new vice-chairman by J.D. Llewelyn, Student Tribunal chancellor.

The senators felt Holley exhibited experience and expertise in parliamentary procedure needed to fulfill the position as vice-chairman.

"I am excited about what is happening with Student Governing Association," Holley said. "Our intern program expanded this year, which I feel will benefit next year's Senate."

Senate also approved the members of the Judicial Council. Some senators voiced concern about the council appointees not all being present at the meeting.

"I don't think it is wise that we, as a body, set a precedent to not approve appointments of people who can not attend our meetings," said Johhny Gaffney, engineering senator.

Senate approved the appointment of Mike Kadel as Senate attorney

Gun fire breaks out near base

ASUNCION, Paraguay — Gunfire broke out Thursday night near a military base in the capital where Paraguay's No. 2 army commander was staying, radio reports said.

The Spanish news agency EFE quoted the Roman Catholic station Radio Caritas as saying the gunfire began at 9:15 p.m. (7:15 p.m. EST) at the army's 1st Calvary Division and lasted 15 minutes.

No reason was given for the outbreak.

Radio Caritas was quoted as saying civilians living in the neighborhood near the base were evacuated.

EFE quoted unofficial reports as saying that the commander of the division, Gen. Andres Rodriguez, was lodged at the base.

Paraguay's president since 1954, Gen. Alfredo Stroessner, is the commander-in-chief.

Protestors riot at Opera Ball

VIENNA, Austria — Hundreds of marchers hurled firebombs and clashed with club-swinging police on Thursday during a rally to protest the social event of the year at Vienna's famed opera house.

The crowd smashed windows, destroyed cars and hurled firecrackers and Molotov cocktails as they marched to protest the lavishness of the Opera Ball, an annual party at the opera house, police and witnesses said.

Police in riot gear used rubber truncheons and water cannons to disperse the crowd as they moved toward the landmark building, witnesses said.

Eight policemen were hurt, Vienna Police Chief Gunther Boegl said on Austrian television. Witnesses also said demonstrators also were injured but police said they had no figures. Two Austrian television cameramen also were reported hurt.

Five protesters were arrested at the site of the demonstration, police said. Two others, including a West German citizen, were arrested on the outskirts of town after firebombs were found in their car.

Cross burning investigated

LOS ANGELES — Federal investigators plan to look into allegations that sheriff's deputies twice burned crosses on floors of the jail where gang members are kept, the Los Angeles Times reported Thursday.

The FBI investigation into whether deputies violated the civil rights of Crips and Bloods gang members would follow the Sheriff's Department's investigation, the newspaper said.

The allegations became public Jan. 6 when a deputy mentioned them while testifying in an unrelated h aring. Sheriff Sherman Block said that hearing was the first time he had heard the allegations.

"If it did occur, who knew about it? Why didn't it make its way up the chain of command as it should have?" he said.

Capt. Dick Walls, a sheriff's spokesman, said Wednesday the FBI had not notified the sheriff's department of its reported intention to investigate the allegations.

Gang suspected in robberies

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A gang of teens called the South Side Posse is suspected of having robbed more than 10 businesses in the past month, including a Holiday Inn where an off-duty officer was shot.

The loose-knit gang includes 10 to 12 boys, ages 15 to 18, police said.

"They consider themselves gangsters," said Sgt. Richard Florea of the Kansas City Police Department's robbery unit.

Man admits to girl's rape

CHILLICOTHE, Mo. — As part of plea agreement Wednesday, Randy K. Belcher admitted abducting and raping a 14-year-old Platte County girl and throwing her into the Missouri River in an attempt to silence her.

Belcher's plea came shortly after a jury had been selected for his trial on charges filed by the Platte County prosecutor's office. The trial was moved from Platte County because of publicity about the case in the Kansas City area.

When jurors returned from lunch to hear opening statements, however, Belcher's lawyer and prosecutors announced the plea agreement.

Belcher, 35, of Kansas City, pleaded guilty to forcible rape, which carries a maximum penalty of life in prison, and to kidnapping, which carries a maximum penalty of 15 years.

In return, prosecutors dropped a sodomy charge and agreed to recommend that the two terms be served concurrently.

Livingston County Circuit Judge Kenneth R. Lewis accepted the plea and ordered a presentence investigation. No date was set for sentencing.

Moose caught for treatment

SUBLETTE — A moose that wandered into Kansas in late 1987 has been captured by a veterinarian who is treating it for intestinal parasites and malnutrition.

Shor Eisele, who has a wildlife rehabilitation center 10 miles outside Sublette, captured the moose after obtaining a permit from the Kansas Wildlife and Parks Department.

"He should weigh 1,600 to 1,800 pounds. He weighs maybe 900," she said.

A laboratory test confirmed the moose has a severe infestation of intestinal parasites. Eisele said he is being treated with worming medication and megavitamin injections in an enclosed barn.

She wants to return him to a northern woods habitat as soon as possible.

"He needs to be back out in the open where he can forage for himself," Eisele said. "He's suffering from a basic lack of nutrition. Moose eat pond and marsh grasses. There's not much of that here."

There had been speculation that a different parasite, sometimes present in the brains of moose, caused it to wander from its home territory. Eisele said that was possible, but the intestinal parasites and poor nutrition also could have caused disorientation.

Since October 1987, the big bull moose has wandered from Avon, S.D. through Nebraska, Kansas, the Oklahoma Panhandle, Texas and back into Kansas.

Bookstore manager appointed

Kay Farley, former associate manager of the University of California-Irvine bookstore, has been appointed manager of the K-State Union Bookstore.

According to Jack Sills, Union director, Farley's first day as manager will be Tuesday. Sills said Farley will be responsible for all aspects of the bookstore.

"She will be totally responsible for the bookstore — from operations to books and school supplies," he said. "Also, Farley will serve as a staff member with the other Union department heads, recommending and establishing direction for the Union."

Farley, who has a bachelor's degree in business administration from National University in Irvine, Calif., replaces acting bookstore manager and Union Assistant Director Jack Connaughton.

Rioting intensifies in Florida

By The Associated Press

TAMPA, Fla. — Rioters threw rocks and bottles and set trash bins on fire Thursday in the second night of violence after a suspected drug dealer died in police custody.

Police cordoned off the same predominantly black neighborhood where about 100 officers in riot gear quelled the first outbreak Wednesday night by about 75 young people. That melee erupted following the arrest of Edgar Allen Price, 40, in an undercover bust.

In an effort to prevent further trouble in the College Hill section, authorities released details of the arrest Thursday. They said Price died of cardiac arrest after struggling to fight off six police officers who finally subdued him. Price had not been beaten or choked, Deputy Chief Thomas DePolis said at a news conference.

But at sundown, more rocks and bottles were hurled and a couple of trash bins were set ablaze, said Sgt. Walter Sluga. He said an officer was hurt when she was hit by a rock, although he didn't know the extent of the injuries.

Six arrests were made Thursday night, Sluga said.

Although the medical examiner ruled that cause of death was cardiac arrest, authorities had not yet determined what caused Price's heart to stop and were still conducting autopsy tests, DePolis said.

"We wanted to dispel any rumors we beat a man to death," said Police Chief Austin McLane.

A grocery store was looted and torched and two shotgun blasts were fired at a news van during the hourlong disturbance. A 21-year-old man was arrested on charges of inciting to riot, disorderly conduct and drinking in public.

A detective involved in the arrest suffered a broken nose and at least three other officers received minor injuries.

Price, a 6-foot-3, 300-pound man, struggled with two undercover officers after an informant made a drug buy in the College Hill area, Cole said.

"The man fought us and punched one of our detectives three times in the nose," said Lt. Jesse James.

Price "picked one of them (officers) up with one hand. He broke away from them," said Cole. After one officer summoned for backup on his radio, six officers arrived and subdued the suspect. Then the disturbance flared as bands of young people began hurling rocks and bottles, the spokesman said.

The size of the crowd was estimated at about 150 Wednesday night, but Mayor Sandy Freedman, who was summoned to the scene, said Thursday there were no more than half that number.

The suspect was carrying 25 pieces of crack cocaine and a 25-caliber derringer in his pockets, Cole said.

Price, of Houston, was sentenced in 1974 to 50 years on a Texas robbery conviction and also had a 1967 robbery arrest on his record, said Cole, adding he did not know the disposition of that case.

Officials cordoned off four intersections in the 22-block housing development and summoned 100 police officers and 30 firefighters to quell the disturbance.

Gene Bexley, owner of Bexley's Bar-B-Q in the neighborhood, said some of the young people looted a grocery store before it was set on fire.

"Once they broke it, it took 10 to 15 minutes and they cleared it out," he said. "Some went in, then things come flying out windows and doors."

The fire forced choir members at the Deliverance Tabernacle Church to move an organ and other valuables into a truck as a precaution.

A young man with a 10-gauge shotgun fired on a WFLA-TV van, said cameraman Rugene Moore.

"I knew he was empty after the second shot," said Moore, who was not injured. "I almost went back to get him. That's what made me mad. I guess the little guy was having a ball."

The College Hill neighborhood and housing development have been the site of frequent confrontations between residents and police in recent years, including an incident last April when a crowd estimated at 300 to 400 threw rocks and bottles.

Fugitive killed in auto mix-up

By The Associated Press

HARRISONVILLE, Mo. — A fugitive who drew police attention because he was driving the same type of car as one used in a savings and loan robbery died in an exchange of gunfire with state troopers.

Later, authorities found the car that was identified as the one seen leaving the robbery and said it was only a coincidence that led them to stop the man who was killed.

The Missouri State Highway Patrol identified the fugitive as Arthur L. Gillis, 47, of Glen Burnie, Md., wanted in Maryland on a fraud warrant.

Trooper Janet Trammell identified a woman, who was in the car with Gillis when troopers began chasing it, as Gillis' wife, Joann.

Gillis said she tried unsuccessfully to get her husband to give up. She was questioned by authorities and was released Thursday afternoon after being held at the Cass County Jail. Patrol officials escorted Joann to the Kansas City airport for a flight back to Maryland.

On Wednesday afternoon, one of the troopers exchanged car-to-car gunfire with Gillis from as close as a few feet. The trooper, J.P. Ripley, lay in his patrol car while his side and back windows were shot out.

The second trooper on the scene, J.L. Wingo, crouched behind his car door and joined in the gunfire from a distance of less than 10 yards from Gillis.

"Apparently, this guy's a bad shot," said Sgt. C.T. Carlyle of the patrol post in Cass County. "Both of them (the troopers) could have been killed."

Both Carlyle and Sgt. Jim Watson, spokesman for the patrol's Troop A in Lee's Summit, said the two troopers handled the shooting properly and had been given thorough training for such events after several troopers had been shot since 1985.

The Highway Patrol's drug and crime unit is continuing an investigation of the shooting.

The chain of events leading to Gillis' death started about 2:10 p.m. Wednesday when two armed men held up the Community Federal Savings and Loan Association in the Kansas City suburb of Lee's Summit. Witnesses told authorities the men fled in a red or orange Chevrolet Camaro or Pontiac Firebird.

About 3 p.m., Ripley saw a southbound red Pontiac Firebird Trans Am on Missouri 291 near Harrisonville. He pulled the car over, but it sped away as he was checking Gillis' identification.

Ripley fired three shots at the car, hit the left rear tire and then began chasing the car, Carlyle said. The chase proceeded onto U.S. 71, and, about four miles north of Missouri 291, the Trans Am went off the right side of the road and crossed a grassy strip to the east outer road.

Kansas scholars, parents visit University

By Deborah Dinges
Collegian Reporter

An estimated 200 Kansas high school scholars and their parents will be participating in K-State's annual Scholarship Day today.

"We want to give prospective students (some) exposure to K-State in addition to rewarding them for their past achievements," said Larry Viterna, director of financial aid.

About 80 percent of the students who particpate in the day will attend K-State next fall, said Larry Moeder, associate director of financial aid.

It is one of the University's most successful ways of informing students about K-State's programs, he said.

The students will spend the morning attending lectures given by faculty on subjects ranging from robotics and computer viruses to survival techniques for academic and social life, Moeder said.

A discussion session concerning housing, financial aid, admissions and student leadership will also be provided specifically for parents, he said.

In the afternoon, a luncheon will be served and students will receive certificates in recognition of their academic achievements, Moeder said. Information from the various colleges will be presented on curriculum, course selection, departmental scholarships, honors programs and credit by examination.

Counseling will be done on an individual basis with the colleges, Viterna said.

"We want to attract these students because we know they are leaders in high school and have the potential to do the same at K-State," Moeder said.

Three of K-State's most prestigious general scholarships have been awarded, he said.

K-State's Presidential Scholarship has been awarded to a national merit semi-finalist, Moeder said. The Putnam Foundation and Leadership scholarships have also been awarded.

Lobby Day set for Monday

By Angie Smith
Collegian Reporter

Lobbying is in the air. Monday, K-State students will join students from the other regents schools to lobby at the the State Capitol for the continuation of Margin of Excellence and other Associated Students of Kansas positions.

John McIntyre, ASK campus director, held a Lobby Day information session Thursday night on how to lobby effectively and provided information on issues affecting Kansas students.

"K-State senators, cabinet members, at-large members and other Lobby Day participants are randomly divided to follow a specific lobby leader. The lobby leader will lead each group in the debate," McIntyre said.

"K-State lobby leaders are scheduled to discuss different issues at specific times with certain legislators," he said.

Mary Jo Lampe, executive adviser to Student Body President Laurian Cuffy, is optimistic about the number of students planning to attend Lobby Day.

"Our goal this year was to not only produce a large number of people going, but to also produce a large number of informed students, and I think we will have accomplished both," Lampe said.

Other debated issues will include a Youth Education Service program designed to meet the needs of educationally disadvantaged students, the establishment of a Kansas Educational Savings Program to help students and families save money in order to meet educational expenses and other issues which are described in the ASK Position Packet. Each legislator will receive a packet which explains ASK positions on the different issues, Lampe said.

McIntyre said last year was the first time a large number of students participated in Lobby Day.

"Over 300 students from different schools went to the State Capitol and Gov. (Mike) Hayden commented on what an incredible turnout it was," McIntyre said.

Vote on death penalty reflects public wishes

Wednesday, the Kansas Senate voted down a capital punishment bill for the second consecutive year. The 22-18 vote against the bill, which would have allowed for the administration of lethal injection to some murderers, was an encouraging, if not surprising, action.

Kansas, one of the nation's most conservative, solidly Republican states, remains one of only 13 states without a dealth penalty law. It is one of only four states west of the Missouri river without such a measure. Kansas' last execution was in 1965.

Does this mean the people of Kansas are more liberal, somehow above the sort of atavistic bloodthirstiness that has overcome much of the rest of the country?

Gov. Mike Hayden doesn't think so. He, along with other death penalty advocates, said he believes Wednesday's vote went against the will of Kansas citizens.

But if the State Senate doesn't speak for Kansas, then who does? Certainly not Hayden. His narrow-minded political agenda has met continuous defeat at the hands of freely and more recently elected state legislators.

But even if Hayden is right and most Kansans do favor the death penalty, he has no right to complain. With such assumed broad support, he and other death penalty advocates should have been able to muster the political support to get the measure through the Senate.

Moreover, ours is a representative democracy, not a government by referendum and TV news phone polls. We elect representatives for a good reason — they are supposed to know what fair government and just law is. Their decisions should be wise and humane, not mere responses to the angry passions of an unenlightened electorate.

For once, our legislators made such a decision.

Other Perspectives

It seems that some people will go to any expense to avoid a good education. Class Notes, a new student-run business in Lawrence, is cashing in on their laziness.

For $1.91 a class, you can skip as many classes as you want and get typewritten notes from the days you missed. Or, for $28 you can buy the entire semester.

For the student who has the money, it is possible to get the same grade as the student who is responsible enough to go to class every day.

But is the purpose of higher education to get the notes, take the tests and pass the class as effortlessly as possible?

Editor's note - Regular columnist Doug Folk has been taken hostage by a radical group of University of Kansas students calling themselves the Sovereign New Order Of Transcendent Youth (SNOOTY). They have threatened to tattoo "I luv Scooter" on his backside unless we agree to print their column. We regret the inconvenience.

Doug ~~Folk~~ BIFF SNODGRASS
Collegian Columnist

Greetings, Silage Technicians.

We, the members of SNOOTY, have decided the time has come to remind those of inferior breeding and upbringing of their proper place in society. We have noticed, as of late, some citizens of our beloved state have begun to think of themselves as being somewhat more significant than history and commonly held perceptions would dictate.

Such wrong thinking must be quickly corrected. To do so, we of SNOOTY have opted to commandeer the space of one of your regular columnists who is known for expressing his warped opinion of K-State's so-called achievements.

He is, at this moment, being forced to recite "I'm a Jay- Jay- Jay- Jay- Jayhawk" while watching videotapes of KU sorority girls applying their makeup in the morning.

We do this in response to recent actions taken by the leaders of K-State. These administrators chose to back the findings of a misguided group of "unbiased" consultants, who recommended the engineering program at K-State be named as the comprehensive engineering program in the state.

These supposed professionals dared to suggest that the regents drop KU's architectural engineering program, focusing resources at K-State's program instead. This they suggested under the guise of "the best interests of the people of Kansas." How utterly naive!

Fortunately, the experts on our own "University Daily Kansan" newspaper staff exposed this as "shoddy research" and refuted these "illogical arguments." Why should one look to outsiders, when we obviously have such a wealth of engineering expertise in our own cozy little neighborhood? Perhaps if the consultants had made some more politically acceptable recommendations, we could have accepted their report.

Dear Aggies, surely you didn't really believe you could convince the members of our esteemed Kansas Board of Regents to take action that might in some way be perceived as detrimental to the University of Kansas, whose hallowed halls have produced some of the finest scholars in the land.

The goal of any action by the regents or the legislature should be for the continued exaltation of KU, our premiere university. Considering the needs of Kansans, while admirable, is clearly secondary.

After all, did not our Regents' Executive Director, the revered Mr. Stanley Z. Koplik, proclaim KU the state's flagship institution? In Kansas' fleet of higher education, you at K-State may consider yourselves on board a supply ship or perhaps a garbage scow.

If you and the other schools in this state would only accept your subordinate status, we could end this pointless quibbling and truly establish KU as the "Harvard of the Plains."

But you pesky little K-Staters seem unwilling to resign yourselves to your destiny. Indeed, this misleading recruiting campaign you have been waging of late has given some people the erroneous impression K-State is somehow comparable to KU.

But surely you realize that a campaign based on things so shallow as "friendly atmosphere" and "academic achievement" is doomed to failure. The desirable high school recruits will recognize KU's superiority in the only areas that really matter: wealth and status.

Yes, it is apparent you country bumpkins are beginning to feel just a little too good about yourselves.

Please remember our clear dominance in the area of sports, as well. After being soundly trounced in Manhattan, your basketball team rode luck, poor officiating and an off day to a slim, undeserved victory in the (House of Phog) Allen Field House.

Of course, you know that if Mitch Richmond should happen to be named NBA Rookie of the Year, it is only because the deserving candidate, Danny Manning, has been removed from contention by injury. And do stop trying to promote that silly "Sixth Man" impression of your home crowds. By George, you heard the announcer last Saturday, our students stood for almost the entire game!

The misleading list goes on. Truman Scholars, Rhodes Scholars, big-name concerts, increased enrollment ... all are giving rise to the false impression that K-State is "on the move." While these "achievements" may appear to reflect positively on K-State, we are determined to correct any such notions by stifling those who would propogate them.

Our suggestion is simply this: K-Staters go back to shoveling manure and give up on these notions of progress and excellence. There is only one institution in this state worthy of those pursuits — KU. And in case you ever begin to doubt that, we and our friends in the Board of Regents will be happy to remind you of it.

That will be all for now. Please feel free to go slop the cows or whatever it is you farmers typically do. We will return what's left of your columnist in a manila envelope.

Oh, Jeeves ... Jeeves. Be a good man and fetch the car. We'll be toddling off now.

Attitudes at fault, not guns

Commentary

Mark S. Anspach

Guest Columnist

Editor's note: Mark S. Anspach is a graduate student in psychology.

In light of all the renewed controversy on gun control, I feel that the true heart of the problem has been missed completely.

An earlier column made the important point that "guns don't kill people, people kill people."

Another stated that "A gun is an inanimate object" and cannot kill on its own. Both of these statements imply that it is the attitudes of individuals which are at fault in the killing with guns issue. In a society with such a widespread belief that using guns for killing is wrong, we don't do very much to teach people that it is so.

As far back as history has been recorded, man has employed the most lethal weapon he could find to use in the destruction of his fellow man. We are the only species of animal on earth which destroys its own kind to such a great extent.

Getting rid of guns would not stop the killing. People would merely use the most available means of carrying out the desired expression of violence.

The problem with guns is that they're such a messy and fear-inspiring means of destruction. Using a gun to kill has a tendency to produce a greater shock for those who hear about the event.

But shouldn't killing in itself be just as fear-inspiring, regardless of the means? Somewhere along the way, people are not truly learning that it is wrong or bad to kill. Just watch an hour or two of television. Killing seems to be a socially acceptable means of dealing with one's problem.

The goal of our efforts should be to improve awareness and acknowledge other people's rights to live and live freely. The world is becoming an increasingly complex place and man has forgotten that his rights extend only to that fuzzy boundary which surrounds him.

Notice that the gun is not the problem here. It is the desire to infringe on another's right to live which is at fault.

I can see the point of one earlier commentary. Some guns seem only good for use in the killing of people. Sadly, this is true.

Many available guns were designed just for that purpose. Yet, far more people own and use this type of weapon without harming people than otherwise. We just never hear about them — they aren't interesting news.

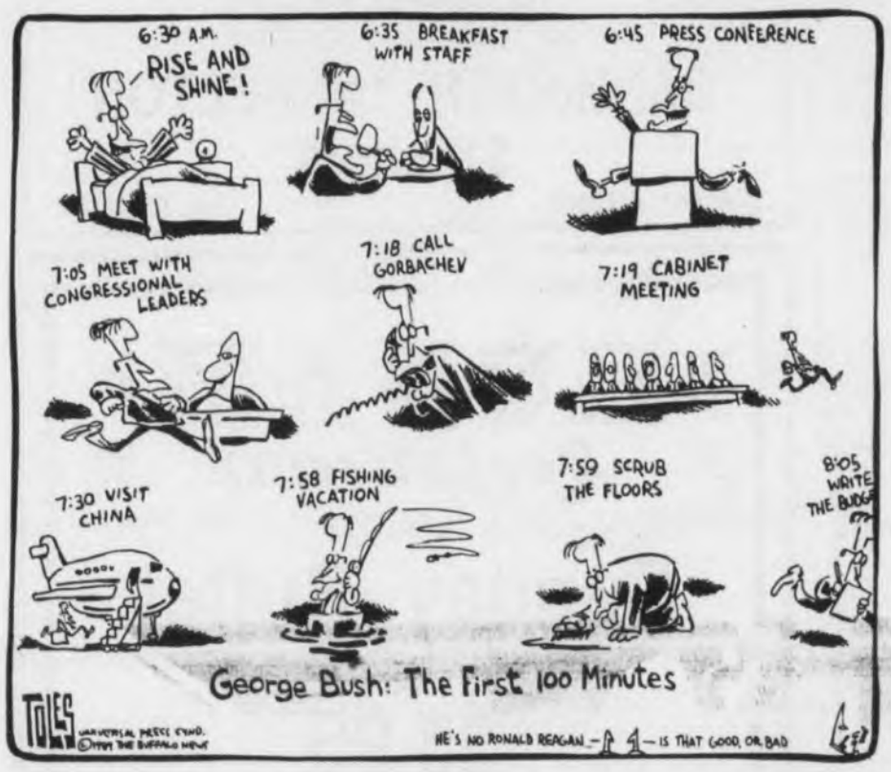
With all due respect to the families involved, events such as a school shooting are highly sensationalized by the media. The killing of innocent children strikes fear in the hearts of all parents and outrages all people.

I maintain that any killing is a sad event. We have learned to almost ignore the many other deaths that occur by different means — poisoning, stabbing, strangulation, auto accident, etc.

Drunk driving, for instance, kills more youth in America today than anything else, and yet the cries of outrage are much stronger against gun-involved murders than drunk driving murders. But then, there are more people who consume alcohol than who own guns.

Drinking is a more acceptable activity I guess, but this is a different argument ... or is it? Don't we defeat alcohol legislation on the grounds that the individual is responsible for his behavior?

In this case, we say attitudes toward drinking are at fault. Our solution is to recommend that people drink in moderation or do not drive when drunk. Only now are we beginning to educate people about being responsible drinkers. Doesn't gun use involve the same principle? When will we also start teaching people to be responsible gun owners?



How can we change attitudes? This is not a simple task. Our response to the gun problem is always "Take away the guns." This is because we can legislate rules against behaviors such as gun ownership, but not against attitudes.

But, attitudes can change as social norms change. If we stop portraying killing as a viable means of solving our problems, there just might be a corresponding decrease in murder. There have been cultures where physical violence is unacceptable (i.e. Eskimo and some African cultures). Interpersonal problems are handled with a form of verbal conflict which does not involve physical violence.

In conclusion, I hope that our society can learn to deal with this problem effectively. Banning guns is tantamount to banning alcohol or burning books. Are we really afraid of the alcohol, the book or the gun? Or are we afraid of the attitudes of those who abuse them?

Dear Mom and Dad:

My first simester her at K state has bin reel good. I'm makin all kind of friends and goin to all kind of good partys, I didn't know college could be such fun. But lemme tell you being a engineerin student aint whot I thought it wud be.

Member how before I came here we talked about how much muny it was gonna cost to go to college. Well, I know you both worked hard to earn that muny, and I kno it aint gonna be easy to pay back the lones you took out, but it's gonna cost a little more for me to go to college.

Now I know your thinkin that I'm buyin to much beer for the guys, but that aint it. See, its gonna cost me $15 more each simester on account of the athlitic departmint. Seems that they spend more muny than they have. (I gess they dont talk to the ecanomiks departunent)

Funny, I never woulda gessed they didnt have enuf muny by looking at the new Bramlage Colisum, its the nicest building on campus. Anyways, I gess that another $120 I'm gonna need to get an educashun.

Oh yeah, I got some more bad news. I know how you were so excited about me bein a engineer, but I dont think I kan do it. It aint that I'm lazy and dont wanna do the work, you know how much I wanted to be an engineer, but it looks you have to pay extra muny to take the engineering lab classes.

I gess the school dont have the muny to pay for it. They say that engineers are gonna be so rich when they graduate that they shud pay for their educashun. Wunder how much the other studints pay?

I'll bet those football players pay alot for school cuz of all the extra stuff they need. (I shur am glad I not one of them.)

Speakin of football players, I couldnt git into that english class I wanted to take cuz it was all full up. I know they have more than once class, but I cud only go to one on account of my part time job.

But see, the one I wanted was the same one all the footbal players wanted cuz it aint at the same time as practis and they git first choice. I gess youll have to wait a wile before you git better letters from me.

I bin goin to the libary tho, and tryin to read so I kan learn how to rite better. One day I went into the magazin room (they call em "journals" here) and half the shelfs were empty. I asked the libarian if they got robbed last nite.

She said no. It seems that they stopped gettin all these magaznes cuz no one reads em. I asked her why did they git em in the first place. She had no idea but she said they are gonna stop gettin over 1000 differint magazines and save $100,000 a year. Imagin that! They bin gettin over 1000 magazines that no one reads.

Oh yeah, I forgot to tell you my new major - Coaching! I kno you think that I'm probably crazy but listen. I was thinkin bout being a profesore her at K state then I talked to one of my profesores and he said he had a PHD and wuznt making half whot profesores at other schools is makin. (He told me not to tell anyone, but he's lookin for a new job) Then I red in the school newspaper that the new football coach is makin almost $90,000 a year. Rite a way I said: Thats for ME!

Kollege shur aint whot I thot was.

Letters

Need cooperation

Editor,

As president of the Amerian Indian Scientists and Engineering Society chapter here on campus, I am writing in response to the article in the Jan. 24 issue of the Collegian about the reinstatement of the Native American Indian Student Body.

AISES is an organization for Native American students in science and engineering majors, as well as those students within the colleges of business and architecture, although we accept members from all majors and ethnic groups. Like the Native American Indian Student Body, we too in recent semesters have been trying to increase our involvement yet we have been plagued by poor attendance.

I have written letters and called each student and have never gotten a positive response, although Native American Indian Student Body has, so I must commend them for that.

One point that bothered me was that AISES was never informed of the meeting on Dec. 5 or even of the possibility of reinstating this organization. This, I believe, is largely a lack of communication among the various organizations located on campus and is something that needs to be rectified.

Secondly, I was upset by the mention of Luci Tapahonso, an American Indian poet coming to K-State. The Native American Indian Student Body may be helping to sponsor her visit, but no mention was made of the fact that AISES is the organization that invited her.

What I found most distressing was that there was absolutely no mention of our organization or any organization for Native Americans on campus. In fact, there are several implications that no such organization exists.

There are quotes such as "We felt all minority groups on campus should be attended to," and their organization is to "be a base organization for Native Americans and help them feel comfortable."

AISES has been located here at K-State for several years as well as around the country for the past 10 years. If students aren't active in our organization, it is not for lack of trying on our part.

We are encouraging the students to get together and be supportive of each other, and we even go so far as to have a dinner each Sunday night for all members.

I agree that there should be an organization for the Native American students on campus, but that's what we are. Don't you think it would be a better idea to get an already established organization going before we try to start a new one?

Why can't we work together to get the students and their customs recognized instead of spending money on two different organizations for the same cause?

We can't ask the students to choose, so let's get interest raised in an organization already established and work together.

Theater success

Editor,

I wish to commend the Warehams for reopening the Wareham Theater downtown.

A friend and I saw the musical, "Laughs and Loves," Jan. 21 and we had a great time. It was just like the dinner theater we were used to seeing in Wichita.

The whole night was a pleasant experience. The singers were great and the food from the Cotton Club was fantastic, with more food than I could eat.

The theater is really a nice addition to the community and I look forward to more performances.

Standing problem

Editor,

Re: Editorial Jan. 13 concerning standing Wildcat fans in Bramlage.

Dr. Dan Kropf's views in a letter to the editor and Doug Folk's editorial analysis were thoughtful and generally positive. However, in the accompanying staff editorial that day, at least one point completely misreads the situation.

The observation that since "only about 65 faculty and staff chose to move" means that "the complaints ... couldn't have come from a sizable portion of the faculty and staff" is patently untrue.

Your reporters have not made the effort to interview a sampling of the fans in Section 18 or you would have drawn a considerably different conclusion. Two reasons fans may have chosen not to move are:

First, to receive their present preferred seats (often not as preferred as those they had in Ahearn), they had to meet several requirements of longevity as season ticket holders, be Athletic Educational Fund financial supporters or contribute to the Bramlage Coliseum (larger gifts than any two or three students, I might add). And there was some uncertainty about where they'd be moved next after this year.

Secondly, they are enduring and patient fans who had hoped rationality and good manners would eventually return so that all fans could once again enjoy the game experience.

You may be interested to know that some of these enduring fans are retirees well into their 70s and perhaps 80s who still enjoy exciting K-State basketball. Think about making your grandparents stand for the most of two hours and see if you feel good about it.

Let's be imaginative and see if we can come up with other more creative and exciting ways to demonstrate our loyalty and support.

Coliseum problems

Editor,

Like most people, when I see something I don't like, I complain about it. I am not going to make Bramlage Coliseum an exception.

By itself, I appreciate the coliseum as a facility able to attract some worthwhile functions to the community. There are, however, some shortcomings that need to be rectified for the coliseum to realize more of its potential, especially for basketball games.

First, there is some decor missing from the seating area. Granted it is colorful, with the purple colors of K-State all around, a scoreboard capable of animation — the red and yellow of McDonald's restaurant, the red, white and black of Farm Bureau Insurance, even the red, white, and blue of Coors Light beer — but where are the red, white and blue colors of the flag of the United States?

If it weren't for the ROTC color guard at center court, there wouldn't be a flag in the arena when the band plays the National Anthem.

I share my second gripe with anyone who has made the mistake of driving to a basketball game.

I am proud and pleased to pay $2 for the privilege of parking in the best sports complex parking lot in the Big Eight, even if it isn't usable.

It seems a bit much to ask someone to wait 30 minutes to get into the parking lot, pay $2 to park the vehicle, watch a game for an hour and 45 minutes, and then wait another 45 minutes to get out of the afore mentioned parking lot.

Thank you athletic department for doing a proper study to ensure there would be no traffic problems.

The last complaint I have room for is best described by the cliche, "highway robbery."

You've probably figured out I'm talking about the high price of refreshments at basketball games.

To me, $1.75 is a bit much for a 20 ounce plastic cup full of ice with a little pop poured over it. It is too much to pay for the product and waste of resources because a lot of people throw their cups away.

Because universities are supposed to be brimming with good ideas, let me offer mine.

Sell the plastic cups for a higher price the first time, then offer a discounted price for refills to those who bring their cups back. Fountain pop is fairly inexpensive, so a group could still make decent money charging $1 for a 32 ounce refill. With many landfills overflowing from non-biodegradable garbage, this will eventually become a must.

I suppose I will have to bear with these shortcomings if I want to continue to attend home basketball games, but the coliseum might be more enjoyable if these changes would be made.

Right to own guns

Editor,

I am writing in response to David Howard's letter on gun control.

I think it is time for people to stop blaming the National Rifle Association for firearm-related criminal activities. David Howard obviously thinks the NRA is an association for outlaws. This is absolutely not the case.

The NRA fights to uphold a right given to every American by the U.S. Constitution: The right to keep and bear arms.

That, Mr. Howard, gives you and me the right to own an AK-47 for target practice, a completely legal activity. While some Americans choose not to own guns, others of us do. That is our right.

Members of the NRA should not be put on the same level as the psychotic Patrick Purdy who opened fire on school children in California. That was a truly tragic event, but in no way was the NRA responsible.

Outlawing or putting restrictions on the sale of firearms will not solve the problem. The act of murder was invented long before gunpowder.

Humorous gender terms in restrooms

Commentary

LeNore Stumpf

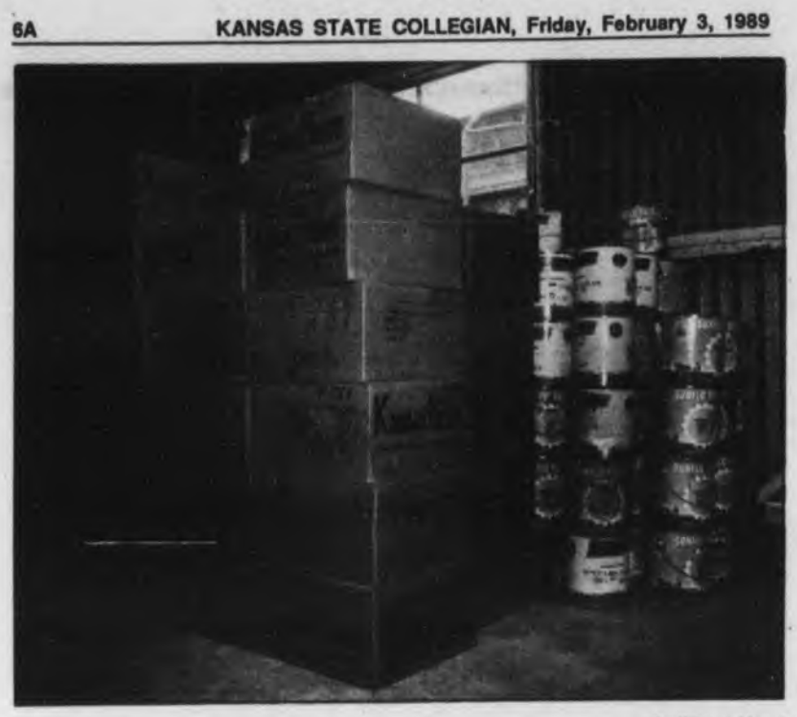
Guest Columnist

There are two things I never fail to check in public buildings: the water fountains and the restrooms.

I never pass a fountain because I'm afraid I'll get behind in my quest to consume eight glasses of water each day. I scout out restrooms because of this, and to see what new and previously unheard of set of titles I will find on the doors of the facilities.

Sometimes I'm pleased to see a matching pair of titles used, such as boys/girls or men/women.

Occasionally there will be something cute like buck/doe. I forgive the owners for trying to be clever and hope no desperate youngster has to stop to determine which door is the correct one.



Most restrooms I have encountered have doors marked with some variation of the mens/ladies school of thought.

The rule of parallelism demands that "men" be paired with "women" and that "ladies" be paired with "gentlemen". That doesn't seem too hard to comprehend.

One door in Manhattan, the location of which shall remain a secret, bears a sign reading "lady's". It doesn't give a clue as to which lady the comfort center belongs to.

Department stores, taking their cue from the folks who name restrooms, advertise "ladies" clothing. Presumably they can be persuaded to sell clothing to "women" also, without asking that they provide some documentaion that they are, indeed, ladies.

There was a time when ladies — or women — did not discuss restrooms in public or even in print, but that idea became obsolete even before cable TV.

and fall with the help of parents.

"It's a crushing blow to us and to the parents who have spent hours and hours of work," Hawks said.

Efforts to reduce the percentage of lead in paint began in 1970 after children in inner city areas began showing signs of lead poisoning after eating peeling paint from walls. Children who ingest enough lead-based paint chips can suffer brain damage or may become mentally retarded, according to a 1972 pamphlet produced by the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

Because the furniture was recently painted, no chipping or flaking is evident, Bolsen said. And although the children are not in any immediate danger, the center has begun to remove the furniture because "the potential for danger is there," she said.

Sharon Wolff, environmental health agent at the Riley County-Manhattan Health Department, said she believed the children at the center were well-supervised and there was no cause for concern.

Wolff said she didn't believe the officials at the center would keep the furniture if it became chipped or flawed and if it did, they "wouldn't let them chew or gnaw on the paint."

All totaled, 95 red and blue pieces of furniture will have to be removed. These include tables, shelving units, sensory tables, sand tables, puzzle racks, coat racks, housekeeping sets, step stools and "cubbies" — boxes where odds and ends are stored.

The furniture will be "removed on a timely basis," Bolsen said.The rooms that house the youngest children are already rid of the furniture.

The 45 pieces of yellow furniture will remain at the center.

Paint

a sanitary landfill because the paint is considered a household waste instead of a hazardous waste, Galitzer said.

Prior to 1986, the year Galitzer began his job at K-State, all University paint was disposed of as hazardous waste.

"At home you would just throw (paint solids) in the trash, but we have to get permission from the Kansas Department of Health and Environment (to dispose of it)," he said.

The cost of hazardous waste disposal for the paint is $600 per 55-gallon barrel, Galitzer said. Each barrel holds 15 to 20 cans of paint. Burying the paint as household waste is much less expensive because the cost consists of only a basic dumping charge.

When the KDHE asked for proof that the paint contained no lead or chromium, Galitzer reviewed the Material Safety Data Sheets published by the Kansas Correctional Industries, the manufacturer of the paint,

Lyndon Kemp, marketing manager for KCI, said the oil-based paints containing lead were manufactured for industrial use and were not intended to be used indoors — especially not in daycare centers.

"We assumed that people would use it for outdoor industrial use," Kemp said. "It shouldn't be used inside ... but we can't question every order."

KCI, on recommendation by the KDHE, ceased manufacturing paint containing lead above the CPSC level three months ago, said Tom Gross of KDHE's Bureau of Waste Management.

KDHE also recommended KCI label its specialty products, such as the color paints, that should be limited to industrial usage, he said.

Larry Sanders, manager of KCI's paint production division, said the paint had not been labeled because it wasn't required and even if it were required, "it wouldn't mean anything to anyone anyway."

Gross said KDHE has no authority to regulate paint, so the issue is a "little out of their league."

KCI plans to take back any remaining paint containing the high lead levels that K-State has in stock, Kemp said.

Housing plans to return 288 gallons, some of which have been opened, Wiley said. He estimated the cost of the paint to be about $2,000.

Kemp received notice of Wiley's request and said KCI must replace at least 76 gallons, all of which are color industrial paints. K-State will have to pay the difference between the cost of any of the old and the new paint, he said.

Norman Root, procurement officer for University facilities, said his department planned to return "in excess of 300 gallons which have never been opened."

Kemp said he had not received any notification of this request.

Galitzer said the new paints produced by KCI will cost more because synthetic pigments used in place of the lead are more expensive.

"As a state institution, we have to buy our paints from KCI unless it is a color they don't have. We are caught in the middle — we have to buy and don't want to," Galitzer said.

Lesbians dispute custody of child

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — A judge has ruled that a lesbian couple's dispute over custody of a child they raised together can proceed to trial, in a case that tests a mostly uncharted area of family law, a lawyer said.

"At the heart of it are fundamental concepts of family, equality and the right of persons who are lesbian to have access to their children," attorney Gloria Allred said.

The lawsuit arises at a time when lesbian partners increasingly are arranging to have children, either by adoption or artificial insemination.

Allred's client, Terri Sabol, 32, of Long Beach, is seeking legal joint custody of a 2-year-old girl who was born to Sabol's then-partner.

The couple conceived the child through artificial insemination, using sperm donated by a relative of Sabol's, Allred said in a telephone interview.

When the couple broke up, the 29-year-old mother, who was not identified, allegedly began to restrict Sabol's time with the girl and refused to permit Sabol to participate in parental decisions.

Sabol sued on Nov. 29 to establish her rights as a parent.

"We asked the court to recognize that this was a family, although not a traditional one, and that it would be unfair to deprive our client of contact with the child," Allred said.

The mother's attorney, Mitchell Jacobs, responded by seeking to dismiss the case in a legal motion known as a demurrer.

The characters of "Cloud 9" will perform the play tonight, Saturday and Feb. 8-11 in Nichols Theatre. The K-State Players' production contains adult situations.

Cloud 9

"It'll be fine when we reach cloud nine, nothing can stand in our way."

"Cloud 9," written by Caryl Churchill, is a play about the politics of sex, gender socialization, colonial oppression and racial issues.

"The neat thing about this play is that it can be very personal to lots of people because at least one of the issues touches all of us," said Kate Anderson, director of "Cloud 9" and associate professor of speech.

Eight actors play all the roles in the first and second acts with cross-gender casting. Because of the cross-gender casting, the scenes that appear to be between men and women are really between two men. Relationships that are between the same sex are played by opposite genders.

"I think that position has a lot to do with the play and I think the reason Caryl Churchill did it that way is so we can see the social convention," Anderson said.

The first act is set in Victorian Africa in the 1880s. Churchill describes Clive as a white man who imposes his ideals on his family and the natives. Betty, Clive's wife, is played by a man because she wants to be what men want her to be.

In the same way, Joshua, the black servant, is played by a white man because he wants to be what whites want him to be.

Edward, Clive's son, is played by a woman because Clive imposes the traditional male stereotype on him while Edward is really more nurturing.

Harry, a homosexual explorer, is in constant struggle against the norms of society. However, Ellen, the governess, keeps her homosexuality invisible.

The second act is set in London in 1979. For the characters, 25 years have passed since they last met, but the second act takes place nearly 100 years after the first.

Clive talks to his wife, Betty, during the production of "Cloud 9."

Churchill made this decision for two reasons. The first reason is because act one takes place in the height of colonialism, rather than during the 1850s. The second reason is that attitudes introduced to children by society are usually very conventional, and attitudes tend to change from childhood to adulthood.

Matthew Mazur, sophomore in theater, plays Harry in act one and Cathy, a four-year-old girl, in act two. He observed his eight nieces during the semester break to help create his character.

"I also tried to regress back to my childhood," Mazur said."Children are amazed and entertained with everything that is around them, even if it's as simple as a bug or a blade of grass."

Part of the play deals with African slavery, said Tony Espinosa, freshman in theater, who plays Joshua in the first act and Edward in the second. A student from South Africa helped him with the dialect and talked with him about the culture.

Costuming for "Cloud 9" had its challenges, said Marta Gilberd, assistant professor of speech and costume designer for the play.

In act one, the characters are dressed in off-white, symbolizing their strata of society, Gilberd said. The second act has more color in the costumes because the surroundings are more sterile and the characters have more color in their personalities.

After actors are fitted for a costume, the actual features of the clothing can help them find their character, especially if the costume is designed right, she said.

"It took me a while to get used to being fitted for a corset," said Geoffrey Kaufman, graduate in speech, who plays Betty in act one and Martin in act two.

"When I was trying on my dress, I immediately realized my waist was too big, my hips aren't wide enough and my hands have big veins in them. "I had to start paying more attention to these areas," Kaufman said.

Terry Lindeman, junior in preprofessional secondary education portrays Clive in act one and Gerry in act two.

High schoolers attend workshop on planning graduation, prom

By Brad Camp
Collegian Reporter

About 225 students from 70 Kansas schools attended a workshop Wednesday and Thursday as part of a Project Graduation conference. The objective of the workshop was to provide information to students and sponsors on how to plan an alcohol- and substance-free graduation or prom.

Bill Arck, director of alcohol and other drug education services, said this was the fourth statewide conference teaching leadership and getting the schools enthused about doing a Project Graduation party.

"Project Graduation is one of the first times that we have united students, teachers and townspeople to get involved," said Carla Deckert, manager of community relations at Blue Cross and Blue Shield in Topeka.

"We have a commitment to the safety of the young people of Kansas," Deckert said. "One event does make a difference."

"The project is held on critical nights when there could be some drinking and driving going on," Arck said.

Margie Eklund, former Project Graduation coordinator in Topeka, said the projects are designed to be chemical-free parties designed by students for the two events when it is most necessary.

"The main thing we try to do is make it the kids' party, ask the kids what activities they want to do," Eklund said. "It's not just parents doing the whole thing."

About half of the schools who attended have already had a Project Graduation party, said Mary Beth Reese, secondary prevention specialist at Manhattan High School who gives practical information on how to set up a Project Graduation party.

At Manhattan High School, Project Graduation has been used for five years. Reese said in 1985, MHS had about a 50 percent attendance; in 1988, more than 81 percent attended.

"The success of Project Graduation has been the kids selling to the kids," Reese said.

"The major element to a capital campaign is to encourage annual giving," Richardson said. "We make statements that focus donors on specific needs. The campaign provides a rationale for making a gift to the University, not just annual giving.

"The donors can channel their money over the total range of needs that the University has or they can look at our case statements and decide exactly where they want their money to go."

contacted by individuals opposing the Metallica concert, including a representative of the Central Youth for Christ organization.

If individuals disapprove of Metallica or any other group, Rosenblatt said, the best boycott is to "keep their hands in their pockets" and refuse to buy tickets.

"Any event that comes to any facility is not mandatory attendance," he said. "People who don't want to come, don't have to come.

"There's no legal reason why a group like Metallica can't appear in this facility."

Senate also approved the members of the student body president's cabinet. Cabinet members were introduced to Senate and answered questions from senators before approval.

Senate heard questions about first readings of two special allocations bills.

One request would grant special funds to Student Governing Association for printing costs.

The other request would allow the Consumer Relations Board to purchase a reference source regarding consumer protection laws and its interpretations.

"I see Clive as a Victorian Archie Bunker," said Lindeman. "His world is the way he wants it and the people around him are told this and they follow it."

Some of the cast members have found themselves saying or doing some everyday tasks in character.

"It's not a form of schizophrenia, just a matter of routine and it carries over into everyday life," Mazur said.

"When I enrolled this spring, I walked around in Maud's stiff character and it was fun," said Penny Cullers, graduate student in speech, who plays Maud in the first act and Lin in the second.

People react differently to members of the upper class, Cullers said.

Anderson said the K-State Players also have an educational role.

"Since we are part of a liberal arts institution, it is part of the educational process to produce plays that can be thought-provoking as well as bring up important current issues," Anderson said. "I don't think the play is as shocking to watch as people might think when they hear about it."

Masturbation and homosexuality are both a part of life and are not matters that don't happen, she said. The fear of talking about these subjects keeps people from communicating with each other.

"We can't be afraid of that. If it can't happen in this environment, where can it happen?" Anderson said.

The audience will play its own role in deciding what benefit it wants from "Cloud 9," she said. The issues in "Cloud 9" are ones that need to be thought about, Anderson said.

"We're not doing this play just to shock people, she said. "We think it is honestly a good play."

Anderson said the play is about respecting differences among people, learning to accept ourselves and others, and realizing that not everyone's concept of reality is the same.

"It's hard to dictate someone's life to them and it can be very damaging," Anderson said.

"Cloud 9" opened last night and will play tonight, Saturday and Feb. 8-11. The play contains adult situations.

Wildcats to battle Mizzou

By Mike Goens
Sports Writer

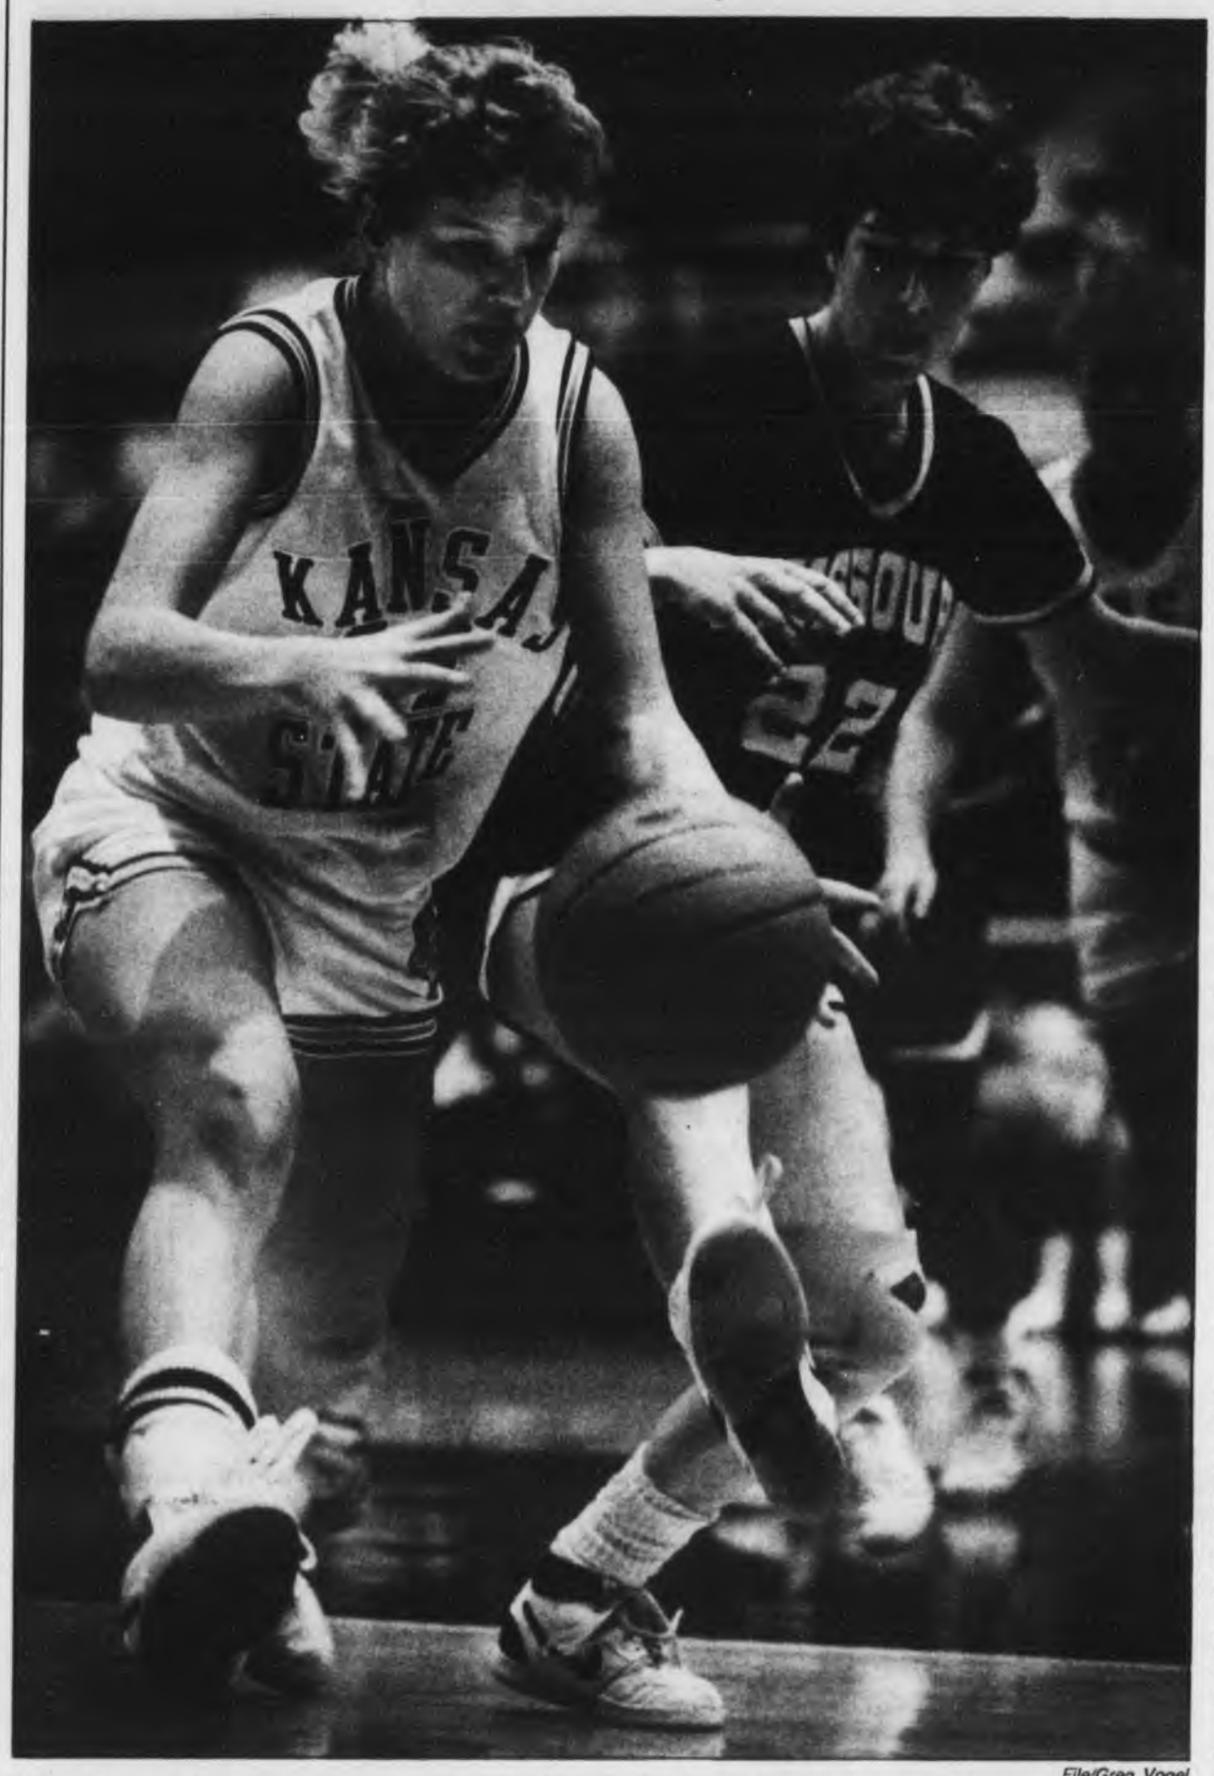
K-State will take on its third consecutive team ranked in the Top 20 and second straight top-five team when it plays the fifth-ranked Missouri Tigers at 1:10 p.m. Saturday at The Hearnes Center in Columbia.

Last Saturday the Cats knocked off the then 18th-ranked Kansas Jayhawks 71-70 in Lawrence and on Wednesday the top-ranked Oklahoma Sooners held off K-State 90-82 in Bramlage Coliseum.

K-State coach Lon Kruger said the game could be the toughest test the Wildcats have had in the last week, although it could be easier to rebound from the loss to OU to get ready for Missouri than it would be to get ready for a lesser team.

"It will be very, very tough to beat Missouri," Kruger said. "This is the toughest test of the three. We survived the first couple and that has given us self-confidence.

"They are very difficult to prepare for. They have so many different weapons, so many different people can hurt you. They create shots for one another."



Missouri is coming off an impressive 91-66 win against Kansas in Allen Field House Wednesday. The win snapped a five-game losing streak by Mizzou in Lawrence. The Tigers were led by Byron Irvin with 22 points and Anthony Peeler, who got 15 off the bench.

Missouri is led by their three guards, Irvin, Lee Coward and Peeler. In their last five games, the Tigers' guards have been averaging a combined 60 points a game. Irvin leads the team in scoring with just more than 21 points a game.

"They create a lot of match-up problems for us," Kruger

Lady Cats seek 5th straight win

Lady Tigers visit K-State Saturday

By Mike Rouse
Collegian Reporter

K-State's women's basketball team will be looking to extend its four-game winning streak as the Lady Cats play host to the Missouri Tigers at 7:30 p.m. Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum.

The Lady Cats have won four consecutive Big Eight games including two on the road. K-State is coming off an 84-83 win against Oklahoma on Wednesday night in Norman. Freshman Mary Jo Miller hit a jump shot with eight seconds left in the game to give the Lady Cats the win.

The last time the Lady Cats lost a game was to Missouri on Jan. 18 in Columbia. The Lady Cats blew a 38-32 halftime lead and lost 82-75. Missouri also outrebounded the Lady Cats by a margin of 47-33.

Missouri enters the contest with a 13-7 record overall and are 4-3 in the Big Eight. The Tigers are third in the Big Eight, one game behind the Lady Cats and three games behind league-leading Colorado. The Tigers lost to Kansas 66-61 Wednesday night in Columbia.

"(The OU game) was a different kind of game than the score indicated," K-State coach Matilda Mossman said. "In the end we were lucky to get the shot and win the game."

The Lady Cats, 15-5 overall and 5-2 in the Big Eight, return to the friendly confines of Bramlage where they display an impressive 9-1 record with a record of 3-1 in the Big Eight.

"The fact we have only lost once at home gives us a boost of confidence," Mossman said.

As the Lady Cats start the second half of the Big Eight schedule, Mossman believes her team is about where she thought they would be. She also said the Lady Cats have made some progress from earlier in the season.

"I feel like we should be 5-2 at this point in the Big Eight, we're a lot better now than we were a couple of months ago," she said.

The second half of the season has the Lady Cats on the road for four of their last seven games. After Saturday's game, the Lady Cats will have only two home games left.

"The rest of the season will be a little tougher; we play the majority of the games on the road," Mossman said. "We just need to take it one game at a time."

K-State center Kristie Bahner continues to pour in the points as she had a career high 22 points in the Oklahoma win. Bahner, last week's Big Eight player of the week, is averaging 11.7 points a game and is leading the squad in rebounds pulling down seven per contest.

Following the Missouri game, the Lady Cats hit the road for three straight games at Iowa State, Nebraska and Colorado and will not be back in action at Bramlage until their Feb. 22 contest with arch-rival KU.

"The rest of the season will be a little tougher; we play the majority of the games on the road."
—Matilda Mossman Lady Cat coach

Three other K-State players are averaging in double figures. Nadira Hazim is averaging 14.1 points a game; Diana Miller is averaging 12.1 points and Mary Jo Miller is averaging 10.1 points. Rita Matteucci, K-State's other starter, is averaging 9.1 points a game. All five starters are averaging in double figures in the seven Big Eight games this season.

Sandie Prophete leads the Tigers in scoring, averaging 19.7 points and 6.4 rebounds a game. Lisa Sandbothe is averaging 11.4 points a game and leads the team in rebounding.

Mossman said she believes the team will have to cut down on their fouls against Missouri. The Tigers made 24 of 31 free throws in the last meeting between the two teams.

"(We) can't let (Missouri) shoot as many free throws," she said. "That was a breakdown on our part defensively last time."

Tracksters on road at 'Husker triangular

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

K-State's men's and women's indoor track teams will venture from the friendly confines of Ahearn Field House for the first time this season to compete in a triangular meet with Nebraska and Arkansas in Lincoln Saturday.

K-State will be competing against two of the premiere track programs in the nation. Both Nebraska's men's and women's teams won the Big Eight Indoor Championships last year. The Arkansas men took the Southwest Conference title and have also won the NCAA indoor title for the past two seasons.

"Nebraska, both men and women, are by far the conference favorites again this year," K-State coach John Capriotti said. "They are always good and they always run big indoors. They are really into it.

"As far as Arkansas, it also has a very strong men's team and its women's cross country team was in the top 10 in the nation this year. So the competition will be pretty tough, but running against teams like this will give our athletes a view of what it takes to be successful at this level."

Capriotti will not be so worried about how the team finishes this weekend. His main concern is that his squads continue to make strides toward getting better.

"Team scores don't really affect me at this point," Capriotti said. "I'm just worried about how the athletes stack up and where we are at this point in the season."

So far, K-State has already qualified three athletes for the NCAA Indoor Championships, which will be March 10-11 at Indianapolis.

On the men's side, sprinter Ray Hill turned in a time of 6.22 seconds in the 55-meter dash to qualify for the NCAA meet. Hill's time puts him in second place among the Big Eight leaders, just .01 of a second behind conference leader Mark Perry of Nebraska, who Hill will face Saturday.

The other men's qualifier is shot putter Dan O'Mara, who qualified in K-State's first meet with a put of 59-2¼ , but O'Mara has since topped that mark and leads the Big Eight at 62-5.

Possibly seeing his first action of the season will be 600-meter specialist Jeff Reynolds. Reynolds, the defending Big Eight champion in the 600 is battling the flu, but Capriotti said he should be ready Saturday.

Capriotti also said Hill has a chance of qualifying for nationals in the 200-meters Saturday. Hill is the conference leader with a time of 21.71. Also among the conference leaders in his specialty is 55-meter hurdler Charles Armstead, who is second with a time of 7.56.

Other K-State men among the Big Eight leaders are high jumpers Chris Samuelson and R. D. Cogswell, who are both tied for third at 6-11½ , and long jumpers Clifton Etheridge and Armstead, who are ranked third and fourth respectively with leaps of 23-3¼ and 24-1.

The women have one athlete who has qualified for nationals in 55-meter hurdles, Kim Kilpatrick, who leads the conference with a time of 7.77.

Capriotti said possibly the best bet among the women to qualify this weekend will be Markeya Jones, running the 200- meters. Jones leads the Big Eight with a 24.68 clocking.

Also among the leaders in the 200 are Latricia Joyner and Kilpatrick, who rank fifth and sixth respectively. Joyner and Jones have turned in the third and fourth best 55-meter times in the conference.

K-State bowlers in action

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

The K-State men's bowling team has a full weekend of Kansas-Nebraska Intercollegiate Bowling Conference competition ahead of them, as they travel to Lawrence on Saturday and then return home Sunday to face bowling powerhouses Wichita State, Nebraska, as well as Emporia State and Kansas.

"We're fourth in the conference right now behind Wichita State, Nebraska and KU," said K-State team captain Mike Messmer.

K-State has a young traveling squad, made up of two seniors and three freshmen. Senior Cary Sommerla leads the team in conference average with a 185 mark. Competing in their first year of intercollegiate bowling competition are Brian Vickers, Eric Maclin and Bruce Smith.

"We've done really well considering the amount of young bowlers we have," Messmer said. "We have had some good showings and we are improving a lot.

Wichita State holds a solid advantage over the other conference teams, posting a .739 winning percentage. Nebraska is second with a .673 winning mark. KU, K-State and Emporia State round out the conference with won-loss percentages of .571, .283 and .232 respectively.

Tennis team to open season

By Carolyn Holcroft
Contributing Writer

This weekend will mark the first indoor tennis tournament on Ahearn Field House's new portable tennis courts, as well as the first meet of the season for the K-State women's tennis team.

Saturday and Sunday, K-State will play host to the KSU Doubles Invitational. Also participating in the tournament are Southwest Missouri State, Wichita State and Creighton.

"They're not as strong as some of the teams in the Big Eight," K-State coach Steve Bietau said, "but it's going to be good competition."

This tournament will be fairly low key in the sense that it's not a team competition and team scores will not be kept, Bietau said. However, it is important developmentally for the athletes and it will be a factor in determining positions on this year's team.

Five K-State doubles teams are entered in this weekend's matches.

"Normally we play with three teams when we have a dual match, so it's going to give everybody on the team a chance to compete and see where they are," Bietau said. "The competition on our team for positions this year has been a lot stronger. We're in the process of settling in and this will be important from that aspect of it."

The format for the tournament is triple elimination and will be divided into two divisions, each having eight teams. The two teams from K-State that normally would play in the No. 1 and No. 2 doubles spots will be in the first division, while the third, fourth, and fifth teams will be entered in the second division, he said.

Because some of the schools will only bring three or four teams, it is possible two teams from the same school will end up playing each other in the finals, which are tentatively scheduled for 2 p.m. Sunday.

Bietau said the most experienced pair K-State has is the doubles combination of juniors, Valerie Rive and Marijke Nel.

K-State also has another experienced tandem in sophomore Miste Bitner and Midland (Texas) Junior College transfer Helen Schildknecht, who played together for two weekends at the end of the fall season. Sophomore Thresa Burcham and another Midland transfer Sara Hancock make up K-State's third team.

"That's a new combination that we're trying this week," said Bietau of the Burcham-Hancock duo. "We're just going to look at it and see how it goes."

K-State's other two doubles teams will have senior Annika Emtell pairing up with freshman Tracy Parker, and Barton County Community College transfer Sherla Biays teaming with freshman Wendy Calta.

The team is also looking forward to the first competition on the new indoor courts and is adapting to the new situation of playing indoor, he said.

The meet will start at 9 a.m. Saturday and Sunday in Ahearn and admission is free.

State's soil could be adopted

Professor advocates legislation

By Darren Keller
Collegian Reporter

Kansas has a state bird, a state mammal, a state flower, a state tree and a state turtle. Orville Bidwell, a retired K-State professor of agronomy, wants the state of Kansas to adopt a soil.

"Kansas has more prairie soils than any other state," Bidwell said. "Prairie soils are more fertile. They're not so leached and they have more organic matter — particularly nitrogen, phosphorus and potassium. And they're excellent for farming."

Mickey Ransom, assistant professor of agronomy, said leaching is the process of water moving through the soil profile and removing nutrients from the soil.

During the winter, Bidwell said rainfall is low in Kansas therefore leaching is minimal and the soil's nutrients are preserved.

"Kansans don't fully appreciate the natural conditions of the land," he said. "By adopting a state soil they will at least be more knowledgeable of what they have."

Bidwell would also like to "catch the attention of the young people" so they can someday help to conserve the soils' valuable nutrients.

According to a document written by Bidwell, "Kansas needs a state soil to provide as a teaching tool and an example of a typical Kansas prairie soil for which there is abundant physical and chemical data — and to which other soils of local or specific interest may be compared."

Bidwell said that of these Kansas prairie soils, Harney silt loam is the best example. It exists on 3,800,000 acres in 25 counties, stretching from Nebraska to Oklahoma in west central Kansas. It constitutes more area than any other soil in the state.

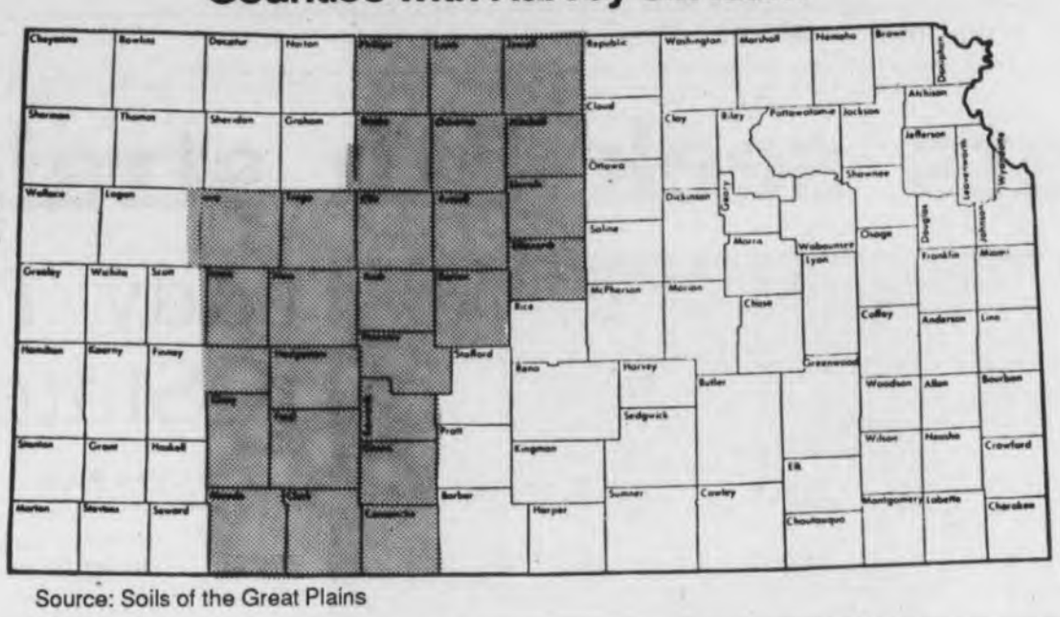
"For 50 years, soil maps have been made for (Kansas) counties from a soil survey report," he said. "From this they determined that Harney is the most soil.

"The Harney's nearly level slopes and thick, dark-colored silt loam surface provide an ideal medium in which to grow crops with a minimum of erosion and other deterioration," Bidwell said in his documen

The interaction of favorable soils and climate, he said, are responsible for Kansas ranking first in the production of wheat and forage sorghum, and second in the production of grain sorghum, among the 50 states.

For this reason we need to acknowledge dependence of the State's economy on unusually productive soils, Bidwell said.

With these facts, Bidwell has twice attempted to pass a bill to adopt a state soil in the state legislature. It has failed both times.



"I thought this would be an easy thing to do, but it seems like Kansans don't want to know about it," he said.

Bidwell is the chairman of the legislative liaison committee for the Kansas Association of Professional Soil Classifiers. Because of his involvement in this committee, he decided to try passing the bill a third time.

Bidwell is waiting for a sponsor from the Kansas Legislature who will aid him in passing the bill by introducing the bill into the legislature.

Six other states have adopted a state soil. These states include, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Iowa, Wisconsin, Vermont and Florida.

Caterpillar's food, appearance linked

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A researcher has found that the appearance of a small caterpillar in Arizona is changed by the caterpillar's food selection.

Erick Greene, a researcher at the University of California at Davis, is expected to report today, in the journal Science, that the caterpillar — nemoria arizonaria — lives on oak trees and develops the camouflage it needs for the season in which it is hatched. In effect, the clever critter has a spring costume and a fall costume.

"Both fall and spring caterpillars have identical genetic material," said Greene. "The spring brood and the fall brood look exactly the same when they hatch. Their later change depends entirely on what the caterpillar eats. Diet cues turn on or off the right set of genes so that they turn into the right shape at the right time of year."

Caterpillars, or larvae, hatched in the spring come out and immediately begin feeding on the oak catkin, or flower. Soon, these caterpillars develop a segemented look that resembles the flower.

After a few weeks, the caterpillar turns into a pupa and later into an adult moth. The adult, which is a brillant emerald green, quickly mates, lays eggs and dies, Greene said.

The new eggs soon hatch and caterpillars identical to the spring brood appear. But once they start feeding, changes occur quickly.

Greene said that by the time the fall brood appears, the oak tree has lost its blossoms and is developing leaves. The new caterpillars feed on these leaves.

Oak leaves have a high content of a chemical compound called tannin. Greene said this compound apparently triggers a genetic response that causes the fall larvae to develop powerful jaws capable of chewing the leathery oak leaves and causes the caterpillar bodies to evolve into a twig-like appearance.

The seasonal changes in appearance allow the spring caterpillar to hide from birds among the oak flowers, while the fall brood hides among the oak branches.

Greene made his discovery by collecting eggs of the insect, hatching them in the laboratory under controlled conditions and then feeding the caterpillars either oak flowers or oak leaves. It proved, he said, that diet made the difference.

Newlyweds choose honeymoon hot spots

By Brad Camp
Collegian Reporter

Bronzing on the beaches of Miami, cruising the Caribbean Sea under the tropical sun or simply visiting a bed-and-breakfast inn is among the top choices for honeymooners.

"The Carribbean is a standard hot spot, as is Mexico and Hawaii," said Bob Pearson, manager of Kansas State Travel.

Cruises and trips to central Florida, southern California and Jamaica are popular, said David Garvin, owner of Creative Travel.

"The best all-around fun place to go is Jamaica," Garvin said.

Cruise packages are available in three categories: three-, four- and seven-day cruises, he said. The expenses for the three-day cruises begin at about $300 and the seven-day cruises are about $1,000.

"The best thing about a cruise is that there are no hidden costs," Garvin said. "All meals, entertainment, air fare and transportation are provided. Plus, couples get a variety of different ports of call.

"Another popular way to travel are the all-inclusive packages. These packages include all meals, entertainment and transportation costs. When the couple makes the honeymoon reservations, they know exactly what the costs are."

Average couples are spending between $600 to $800 for a honeymoon-type trip, Pearson said.

Lori Barr, Manhattan, said she and her fiance are planning to spend their honeymoon at a Kansas bed-and-breakfast inn.

"We wanted to go to one in Council Grove or Abilene, some historical town where we can see the sights," Barr said.

Kim Hemeyer, travel consultant for Creative Travel, was married last May.

"We went to Key West because I love the beach," Hemeyer said.

However, Key West turned out to be a poor choice for beachgoers because the water is above a coral reef and there are no beaches, she said.

Garvin said people want to do something special for their honeymoon, "because generally, it is a one-shot deal."

Legislators may receive raise

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — House Speaker Jim Wright, reacting to growing public outrage, said Thursday the House would let a 51 percent congressional pay raise take effect next week, but then vote to cut it back to "a decent raise" of 30 percent.

The Senate, meanwhile, prepared Thursday evening to debate a joint resolution killing the big pay raise, and a companion measure to restrict speaking fees and other honoraria received by its members.

House members' public positions, like those of the Senate, have been overwhelmingly against the proposed 51 percent pay increase, which must be disapproved by both chambers before Feb. 8 or it will automatically take effect.

But Wright said Thursday a "clear majority" of the House privately supported his plan for dodging a pre-deadline vote and then voting a partial rollback of the raise along with a ban on honoraria.

However, the restrictive parliamentary procedure planned by the speaker requires a tough two-thirds vote before the bill could be sent to the Senate. The 51 percent raise would remain in effect unless both chambers agreed to cut it back, and House opponents vowed to roll it back to zero whether Wright wins or loses.

"It would be very difficult for the speaker to find two-thirds for this resolution," said Rep. Tom Tauke, R-Iowa.

Wright released partial results of a personal questionnaire, showing 57 percent of House members opposing a pay raise vote before the deadline and 54 percent favoring instead a vote to reduce the raise to 30 percent.

The $26,850 pay raise he was proposing was "a decent raise but not an exhorbitant raise," Wright said, compared with the $45,500 increase proposed by former President Reagan and endorsed by President Bush.

The 30 percent figure was equal to the amount of income House members could lose in a ban on honoraria. The Senate figure is $35,800, as its members are currently allowed to retain honoraria equal to 40 percent of their salaries.

House members would still make the same amount of money they make now, he said. "The difference is we will be serving one master, not two, that is, the American people," he said.

Actually, most House members would find their incomes substantially increased, since fewer than half reach the current honoraria limit of 30 percent of income, according to their financial disclosures.

Wright said it was his intention that all top federal officials, including federal judges, would receive the same increase. Under his strategy, federal judges might still win the full 51 percent pay increase, since under the Constitution those new salaries cannot be reduced once enacted.

Wright has met with House Republican leader Bob Michel of Illinois to solicit his endorsement of the plan.

Subcommittee to review Kansas City explosion

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — An accident that killed six Kansas City, Mo. firefighters last year will be the focus of congressional hearings, it was announced Thursday.

Rep. Jan Meyers, an Overland Park Republican, said a House Government Operations subcommittee will look at the accident as part of a March 1 hearing on problems faced by firefighters in dealing with hazardous materials. The employment and housing subcommittee is to consider ways of increasing safety for firefighters.

A subcommittee of the House Science, Space and Technology Committee will conduct a separate hearing on the Kansas City accident, said Meyers. It is planned in late April or early May. She said lawmakers will review a soon-to-be released report on the accident by the U.S. Fire Administration.

The Kansas City firefighters were killed last November in a chemical explosion at a construction site.

Meyers said the accident pointed to the need for Congress to consider tightening laws that require notices to local authorities by companies using hazardous materials, like the chemical in the Kansas City explosion.

The congresswoman said there had been other recent problems with hazardous materials in the Kansas City area, including a truck that caught fire in December while carrying drums of a chemical.

"This is not just a Kansas City problem or a Midwest problem," Meyers said in a statement. "It's a national problem and our attention must also focus on preventing a disaster of such magnitude from ever again happening."

Film chronicles long-lasting friendship

Characters cope with diversity in life

By Stacy Sweazy
Collegian Reviewer

"Beaches" is about two women, who despite having opposite backgrounds, still preserve a life-long friendship.

The film starts with the women's first meeting as 11-year-old girls on the beaches of Atlantic City in 1957.

Review

Bette Midler, as C.C. Bloom, a spunky redhead of Jewish decent, befriends Hillary Whitney, who is portrayed by Barbara Hershey.

Whitney is a wealthy child, who has grown up in a sterile environment. Both children have been raised in one-parent households, which could be a factor in their everlasting cohesiveness.

Through the years the friends survive adolescence and young adulthood via the U.S. Postal Service. Later Whitney gets tired of her conservative, Barbie-doll life and jumps the earliest flight to New York City to reacquaint herself with her childhood soul mate.

She finds Bloom in a slummy bar on the Lower East Side, singing jazz and trying to make a buck. The reunion is fairly believable because both Bloom and Whitney are uncomfortable.

Whitney is especially anxious of her decision to take a bite of the Big Apple when she sees Bloom's unconventional lifestyle, but soon finds herself consumed in helping the lower-class plebeians of New York. Together their personal qualities make up the ideal woman.

However, they both fall in love with the same man, played by John Heard.

Bloom wins the love battle, proposes in bed and is decked in white at the alter in the next scene.

Years pass with fortune, fame and crisis entering into the picture. Both get divorces, Bloom finds her success and Whitney finds herself with child.

Whitney is later struck with heart disease and the plot begins to die along with the character. It's a tear-jerker, but the movie starts to drag and Hershey becomes boring. Her features automatically start to fade with frozen smiles and even her newly puffed lips don't make her more pouty.

Mayim Bialik, who plays Bloom at age eleven, is a lanky, brash red-headed kid with buck teeth and has the pizzazz of a Bette Midler double. The match of the tone and facial features of Bialik and Midler is phenomenal.

Midler succeeds in showing a lot of clevage and belting out some great music that enhances the film, especially the pop-ballad version of "Under the Boardwalk." She sounds terrific and her second soundtrack was ranked number 10 three weeks after the movie's opening. Tremendous passion comes out in her music, thus drawing the audience closer to Bloom than to Whitney.

Midler's gaudy style and overbearing personality fit her character — but those traits seem to fit all her characters in the movies "The Rose," "Ruthless People," and "Down and Out In Beverly Hills." Granted "Beaches" is only the first drama for Midler since "The Rose," and she is once again, a singer.

Garry Marshall, who directed "Beaches," should have tried a new twist for the end. The "'til death, the movie doesn't end" finale is getting tiresome.

"Beaches" is entertaining, especially to Midler and Hershey fans, but the lovers' triangle and death-bed ending are too trite to make the film a blockbuster.

Math professor honored with West German award

By Carol Knorr
Collegian Reporter

Ernest Shult, professor of mathematics, has been honored internationally for his achievements in research and teaching.

In the spring of 1988, Shult was named the recipient of the Alexander von Humboldt Award given by the West German government which honors senior U.S. scientists.

The award was developed to promote scientific cooperation between institutions in the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany.

German scientists at the University of Freiburg recommended Shult for the award.

With the award, he received $45,000 to fund research and travel.

Shult's distinction stemmed from cumulative research throughout his career in the areas of finite group theory, geometry and combinatorics, said Louis Pigno, head of the math department and professor of mathematics.

During his sabbatical this academic year, Shult lectured in West Germany.

"He will be lecturing on his recognition theorems, as well as collaborating with West German scientists and mathematicians," Pigno said.

During the summer Shult will be lecturing at universities in China on his recognition results for infinite geometries.

"Lately, Professor Shult has proved some very interesting recognition theorems," he said.

The recognition theorems demonstrate that from a minimal amount of data, geometric objects can be identified.

"These geometric objects are very important in modern physics in the study of supersymmetries, which is an idea developed by physicists to complete the laws of physical nature," Pigno said.

Shult is not new to the research field. David Surowski, director of graduate studies for the math department and associate professor of mathemetics, said Shult had some sufficiently substantial papers published at the age of 18 or 19.

"After graduate school, (Shult) became interested in finite group theory in areas of finite solvable groups and finite simple groups," Surowski said.

In the early 1970s, Shult's interests gravitated to the area of finite geometry, he said.

Surowski said he thinks it is a real mistake to judge Shult only on his published work.

"(Shult) is so much different from everyone else in the math department," Surowski said. "He will drop everything to listen to your problem, take notes on it and then ask questions — penetrating questions. And he always has the right comment.

"He thinks on his feet. It's an amazing thing to watch. His capacity to think like he does is where his real value lies."

Surowski said he considers Shult a workaholic because, even in Shult's free time, he talks about mathematics.

Pigno said Shult has continued his research on group theory and geometry while in Germany.

"He just sent a manuscript of 50 pages and a technical typist is now typing it," Pigno said.

Shult has a bachelor and master's degree from Southern Illinois University in Carbondale, Ill., and received a doctorate from the University of Illinois in Urbana, Ill.

Shult was appointed to the Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton in 1968.

Robber's act doesn't fool judge

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A robbery defendant who tried to fool the judge was praised for his skill as an actor before being sentenced to 50 years in prison Thursday.

U.S. District Judge Dean Whipple told Gerald Lucas, 33, of Kansas City that he was "very skillful" at pretending to be mentally incompetent. But Whipple told Lucas he knew all about the act.

"You've done very well playing the system by pretending to be incompetent. ... You've fooled a lot of people," Whipple said.

"It's obvious you are never going to work for a living or lead a law-abiding life. I'm going to take you off the street as long as I can," the judge told Lucas, who chanted obscenities and eventually was handcuffed during the hearing before Whipple.

Whipple said Lucas had been charged in at least 14 armed robberies over the years but had been convicted in just four of the cases.

Lucas was convicted Dec. 7 by a federal jury for two armed robberies of branches of the Home Savings Association in 1986. He was taken from the courtroom several times because of outbursts at the judge, jurors and government witnesses.

After the arrest of Lucas in August 1986, he refused to speak and was sent to the U.S. Medical Center for Federal Prisoners in Springfield, Mo. Psychiatrists concluded that he was incompetent and he remained there until February 1988, when authorities learned from another inmate that Lucas could speak with no difficulty, said Dan Stewart, an assistant U.S. attorney.

Stewart said the psychiatrists determined after further examination that Lucas was feigning incompetency.

'Cats

said. "Especially their three perimeter people. They like to get it out and push it up the floor."

K-State gave No. 1 Oklahoma a partial scare Wednesday before fading late. The 'Cats tied the game, 80-80, with just more than three minutes to play, but a three-pointer by Terrence Mullins put the Sooners up by three and on the way to a successful first defense of their No. 1 ranking.

"It's a tremendous disappointment, but we also recognize the effort was there," Kruger said. "We've made strides and progressed. (The players) have realized what it takes to compete in the Big Eight.

"We had the opportunities and didn't finish it. When you play against top flight people, you win some of those and you lose some of those. You like the challenge to line up against good people."

Missouri beat K-State last year in Columbia 79-75, behind Derrick Chievous' 26 points and Lee Coward's 25. Chievous is now in the NBA with the Houston Rockets.

"Personnel-wise they are similar," Kruger said. "But they are a year older with more experience."

Missouri enters the contest with a 10-game winning streak. The Tigers are 19-3 overall and 5-0 in the Big Eight. Missouri's home record this year is 11-0. K-State stands at 12-6 overall and 3-3 in the conference.

Quote dictates attire

Traditions continue

By Linda Kleiner
Collegian Reporter

For generations a famous quote from an anonymous poem has dictated to brides what to wear on their wedding day.

"Something old, something new, something borrowed, something blue and a lucky sixpence in your shoe."

"Probably one out of two brides actually mention the traditional (quote)," said Shelly Holle, manager of Christine's-The Wedding Company. "Usually the bride's mother or bridesmaid gets the items for the bride."

According to "Your Wedding" by Nancy Piccione, there are many items that can fulfill the requirements of the traditional quote.

Something old can be an heirloom jewel, a small prayer book or an antique handkerchief originally carried by a member of the bride's family, Piccione said.

"Some brides wear their mother's wedding dress (to symbolize something old)," said Diane Helgesen, production manager at Christine's.

If a happily married woman gives the bride one of her keepsakes representing something old, good fortune of the giver's happiness will be passed to the bride, Piccione said.

The bridal gown, veil, shoes or flower bouquet can represent something new, she said.

The long ribbons hanging from the bridal bouquet contain a row of knots. The bride may make a wish for each knot including one wish of happiness for the person who catches her bouquet. If the knots are ever untied, the wishes will not come true, Piccione said.

Something borrowed can be a family heirloom or a personal item lent to the bride by a close friend, she said.

Helgesen said, "Several brides borrow pearl necklaces or other necklaces to wear."

The ancient Israelites believed blue signified stability or permanence in relationships, Piccione said.

The kiss exchanged after the couple complete their vows is even a tradition from ancient times. It signifies the couple's faith, love, respect and obedience to mutual beliefs and seals the confidence they share privately, Piccione said.

Wedding plans limit stress

By The Collegian Staff

The planning of a wedding can be time-consuming and stressful for a bride-to-be. However, according to Manhattan bridal consultants, planning a fantasy wedding does not have to be a stressful situation.

"(Women) should enjoy the planning they do for a wedding," said Tanya Bachamp, manager of Edelaine's. "A bride should have time to look for ideas and decide what is most important."

Using a wedding planner to record the details of the wedding is important, Bachamp said.

Shelly Holle, manager of Christine's-The Wedding Company in Aggieville, said many methods of organization are available including a bridal guide and a bridal file.

Planning assistance is available through Edelaine's and Dillon's Florist Shop, providing complimentary wedding planners for brides. The six- and 12-month planners have detailed wedding preparation lists. Bridal magazines also publish time guidelines.

Having a written timetable makes a big difference and makes it so much easier to organize the event, Bachamp said.

The beginning of the year is a popular season for brides-to-be to begin planning their wedding, Holle said. Many women receive engagement rings as a Christmas gift or for Valentine's Day and will begin preliminary planning.

Christine's two busiest wedding periods are from May to June and during Christmas, she said. In addition, January and February are busy planning months for late-spring weddings.

Bachamp said late-spring weddings planned near college finals create pressure. Many brides planning their wedding in the same time frame as their college graduation are trying to accomodate friends and relatives for both events.

She advised brides to schedule a late-spring wedding six weeks after college graduation to allow ample time for stress reduction and last-minute wedding plans.

However, Holle said a wedding near graduation day can be planned effectively.

"It's workable as long as it's organized," she said.

Bush opens arms-sales talks

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration has opened arms-sale talks with Congress that potentially include shipping 35 Abrams tanks, considered the world's best, to Saudi Arabia and 40 sophisticated FA-18 jet fighters to the United Arab Emirates, congressional and other sources said Thursday.

Other Arab states would be in line for U.S. armaments under the proposal, made in the next to the last day of the Reagan administration and now the focus of discussions between the Bush White House and Congress.

Also proposed: 200 Abrams tanks, seven multiple-launched battlefield rocket systems and 1,500 Tow anti-tank missiles for Kuwait; 40 Maverick air-to-ground missiles with an infra-red guidance system and electronic warfare gear for Bahrain; 24 F-16 jet fighters, 100 Mavericks and 100 Sidewinder air-to-air missiles for Morocco, and seven of the battlefield rocket systems for Saudi Arabia.

Greece would get 60 M48 tanks and 100 Harpoon anti-ship missiles for Greece.

If Bush follows through, the proposed Arab sales would seem sure to touch off a battle with congressional supporters of Israel, which is concerned that sophisticated weapons in Arabian hands could be turned against Israel in a Mideast conflict.

The list is classified; a copy was obtained by The Associated Press.

Charles E. Redman, the State Department spokesman, declined to identify the weapons under consideration for sale. He stressed that the document did not amount to a "sale plan," but rather to the administration's "best estimate" of other countries' weapons needs.

"Each item has to be reviewed by this administration," Redman said.

Congress has the power to block a purchase, but only if a majority of both the Senate and the House reject a formal White House notification of intended sale.

The informal list was sent to Congress on Jan. 19 by the outgoing Reagan administration.

Bankers rebuked for ads

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — White House Chief of Staff John Sununu rebuked bankers Thursday over "irresponsible" newspaper advertisements encouraging savings and loan customers to withdraw their deposits, industry officials said.

Sununu raised the issue during a private, hour-long meeting attended by President Bush, Treasury Secretary Nicholas Brady, Budget Director Richard Darman and representatives of five bank and S&L groups, said Frederick Webber, president of the U.S. League of Savings Institutions, who attended the meeting.

Another source, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said, "Sununu characterized the ads twice or three times as irresponsible. He said, 'This type of garbage is irresponsible.'"

Meanwhile, the General Accounting Office urged the government, after agreement is reached later this year on an S&L bailout and reform package, to promptly take control of the 350 remaining insolvent, but still open, institutions.

Bush, at the White House meeting, did not address the ads or reveal any preference among the many options for addressing the S&L crisis, according to participants.

"He was there to learn from us and he's a good listener," Webber said. "It was very gratifying. The man is personally involved in this."

White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said the president, who will meet with members of Congress on the subject this morning, will detail his S&L program in a speech to Congress next Friday.

Meeting participants said Bush indicated he has not yet received recommendations from the Treasury Department. But Fitzwater said that proposals in the address to Congress "will be pretty specific. You'll know exactly what our proposal is."

Sununu's anger over the advertisements underscores the administration's concern that the debate in Washington over how to pay for the S&L crisis has unnerved some thrift depositors even though no one in government has suggested that insured deposits are not fully protected.

Cold wave hits Manhattan

By Karen Allen
Staff Writer

Although bitter temperatures have chilled Manhattan since last Wednesday, the number of residents seeking refuge from the cold at the Manhattan Emergency Shelter has not increased, said Lonnie Catlin, night staff supervisor at the shelter.

As of Sunday night, five people were staying at the shelter, which can house up to 30 people. Catlin said he was surprised the shelter was not more crowded.

"Either there is a decrease in homelessness or people are finding other places more convenient to their needs," he said.

People who need a place to stay may be staying with friends or family instead of coming to the shelter, Catlin said.

The cold weather is expected to continue today with one to three inches of snow possible by evening in the southwest through northeast parts of the state. The high temperatures should range from 0 degrees in the northwest to 10 degrees in the southeast. Tuesday should be partly sunny and not quite as cold, with high temperatures ranging from 8 degrees to 16 degrees.

Officials from both The Saint Mary Hospital and Memorial Hospital said they haven't seen an increase of cold weather-related accidents.

"People are being smart and staying in," said Coleen Rakes, nursing supervisor at The Saint Mary Hospital.

The house supervisor at Memorial Hospital said most of their patients have been victims of the flu.

Both nurses said wearing layered clothes is the best way to dress for the cold weather.

Besides responding to one two-car accident Saturday, most of the calls to the KSU Police Department have been from students whose cars wouldn't start and were concerned about getting ticketed, said Dispatcher Greg Girard.

Most complaints come from owners of cars who have been blocked in by other vehicles, Girard said.

Coup raises praise, concern

By Kevin Kramer
Staff Writer

The military coup in Paraguay Friday did not change the travel plans of 12 Paraguayan professors and one K-State faculty member returning to the National University of Asuncion, but it did raise both praise and concern by Paraguayan students.

"The reports we were getting were saying that everything is calm and that no special passes are needed to enter the country," said Meredith Smith, associate professor of foods and nutrition.

"We were up all night listening to the news reports coming in," Smith said. "I was in contact with the visiting professors and students throughout the night, keeping them informed of what was happening."

Smith said she called her husband, Nelson de Barros Barreto, director of the KSU-Paraguay Cooperative, who was in Sao Paulo, Brazil, for a conference.

"I was checking to see if he had heard of any information that we had not gotten through the American press," she said. "But I ended up giving him more news about the coup than he had heard from reports in Brazil."

Smith said she has no concerns about going back to Paraguay, and has been assured things are now under control.

"I was very concerned about the location of the fighting that was taking place," she said. "Our house in Asuncion is only a block and a half from the police station that was burned to the ground. If the fighting that took place during the coup was in the streets, it could have been near our home."

Paraguay is not a country where mobs of people fight, Smith said. The people tend to keep their heads down and doors closed.

"I am anxious to get back to see what will take place with the new government," she said.

The new government is saying it wants to respect human rights and honesty, Smith said. The new president, Gen. Andres Rodriguez, wants to push on with the changes that were occurring in education.

"I don't think there will be any major change at the National University," said Alfredo Stauffer, professor in plant pathology from the National University of Asuncion. "The coup will not effect the KSU-Paragauy partnership. The change in the government could, however, increase the work we are doing now."

There is no foreseen change in the project, Smith said. The present minister of agriculture — who did not change during the coup — is in support of the program.

The president of the National University of Asuncion, Dionisio Gonzalez Torres, is expected to be named the minister of education under the new government, she said.

"I expect to see an increase in the availability of resources used to support and develop educational programs in Paraguay due to the change in the government," Smith said. "Our hope is to continue the emphasis on the development and education of the rural areas."

Ruth Britez, graduate student in business administration, and Rosa Maria Vera, graduate student in food and nutrition, said they have been in contact with relatives in Paraguay since the coup.

"The situation is getting better," Britez said. "Everyone is happy about the new leadership. The first steps taken by Gen. Andres Rodriguez was to re-open the democratic newspaper and the government opposition radio station."

The government was needing this change several years ago, she said, adding that the old president, Alfredo Stroessner, was a good person, but because of illness was losing power to "dishonest ministers."

"The ministers were behind the government's unjust actions of shutting down the opposition newspaper and radio station, and the suppression of opposition group meetings," Britez said.

The students at the National University were very active in political opposition, and were looking for a change in government, she said. Two or three on-campus opposition groups involved 800 to 1,000 students.

"My family lives about 200 miles south of Asuncion in San Ignacio," Vera said. "They are OK, but I was worried about my four cousins in the military.

"One of my cousins was a chief security officer for President Stroessner. He was captured and is now in jail. The other three cousins are not in jail and are doing fine."

Vera said the new government is a big change for the people of Paraguay, especially the young. They have known no president other than Stroessner.

Former president flees country in exile

By The Associated Press

ASUNCION, Paraguay — Former President Alfredo Stroessner Sunday boarded a jetliner at the airport that bears his name and flew to exile in Brazil, his 34-year-old grip on this nation ended by a military coup that left hundreds dead.

Also Sunday, the new president, Gen. Andres Rodriguez, announced that elections for president and Congress will be held in 90 days.

As Stroessner led about 20 family members and aides up the steps to the jet, onlookers on the observation deck at President Stroessner International Airport jeered, clapped and chanted, "Dictator Get Out!" and "Adios! Adios!"

Stroessner landed at 4:55 p.m. in Campinas, 290 miles southwest of Rio de Janeiro, on a Paraguay Airlines Boeing 707, then left on another aircraft for the small town of Itumbiara in the central Brazilian state of Goias, Brazilian sources said.

A foreign ministry source, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Stroessner, who has property in the area, was to stay in Itumbiara "only temporarily."

Temporary asylum was granted to Stroessner and his son, Gustavo, who was considered Stroessner's heir apparent. Also granted asylum were Gustavo's wife, Maria; six security guards and ex-Foreign Minister Rodney Elpidio Acevedo, said Jose Roberto Pinto, chief of the Brazilian

Board to hear rezoning plans

By Audra Dietz
Contributing Writer

The Manhattan Area Planning Board will hold a public hearing at 7 p.m. tonight at City Hall to consider rezoning a tract of land on the corner of Kimball and College avenues to allow construction of an apartment complex.

A Lawrence developer wants the board to change the zone from an R1, single family residential, to a planned unit development zone. Local residents say they do not want a PUD zone in a residential district.

"We are against the development because we would lose our privacy," said Lois Farlin, adjacent land owner who resides on the north border of the tract.

"It is not the best place for a big complex," said Robert Clegg, adjacent landowner. Clegg lives near the tract's western border.

The five-and-a-half acre tract is owned by Jerry Donnelly of Lawrence. He has contracted with Bo Newsome Construction to build a 120-unit student housing complex to be called Greenbriar.

"This project is aimed at the college market," Donnelly said.

Man injures customer, wrecks Espresso Royale

By Paul Branson
Staff Writer

Riley County police arrested a man for battery and criminal damage to property at Espresso Royale Sunday evening.

The incident resulted in an injury to a customer and damage to the establishment. Damage estimates for the cafe are expected to be completed today.

Witnesses said Stephen A. Keller, a soldier stationed at Fort Riley, entered the cafe at about 11 p.m. and proceeded to damage various items at the front counter.

Timothy Olson, 26, of Fort Hood, Texas, was injured as he tried to calm Keller. According to police, Olson received an injury to his hand. He was transported to Memorial Hospital where he was treated and released.

"He just came in and started pounding on the glass case and then started breaking glasses," said Neil Payne, freshman in business administration.

He said Keller hit Olson after Olson told him to "chill out."

"A couple of guys grabbed him (Keller) and held him down while I ran out and got the police," Payne said.

Angiela Meyer, freshman in political science and an employee of Espresso Royale, said in addition to breaking glasses, Keller pushed the business' electronic cash register off the counter.

Prisoners die in packed cell

SAO PAULO, Brazil — Eighteen prisoners died and eight others were injured after they were jammed into a tiny cell in a punitive action following an attempted jail break, authorities said Sunday.

Several of the 18 died of asphyxiation, while others were trampled to death by cellmates when more than 50 prisoners were packed into a 3-by-9 foot cell with no window or ventilation, Sao Paulo state prison system spokesman Guilherme Santana told The Associated Press.

One was shot to death, said Carlos Vasconcellos, who is in charge of the Parque Sao Lucas jail where the incident occurred.

The prisoners were forced into the cell after grabbing prison guard Teresa Dantas in an early morning attempted break from the jail, in a working-class neighborhood of Sao Paulo.

Last Soviet leaves Kabul

KABUL, Afghanistan — The last Soviet soldier left the capital on Sunday, radio reports said, and President Najib told thousands of communist loyalists that his fragile government will survive the rebel tide.

Moscow Radio said all Soviet troops were out of Kabul, according to British Broadcasting Corp. monitors in London.

The radio quoted Monday's edition of the communist daily Pravda as reporting that "on Sunday, the last Soviet soldier left Kabul." It said soldiers remained in other parts of the country but were moving toward the Soviet border.

Moscow Radio said Pravda quoted the commander of Soviet forces in Afghanistan, Gen. Boris Gromov, as saying the withdrawal was proceeding according to schedule, the BBC monitors reported.

"He said that the column of Soviet troops did not come under fire. ... There were snow slides during the withdrawal, though, and three men were killed and one was injured by them," the radio reported, according to the monitors.

In Kabul on Sunday, Najib told about 10,000 members of the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan that his Marxist government will survive the rebel onslaught despite the Soviet pullout after a decade-long occupation.

"God is with us. The people are with us. We will win the war," Najib told about 10,000 members of the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan, who gathered in freezing temperatures near the presidential palace.

In neighboring Pakistan, Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze extended talks on the civil war. Guerrilla sources said he would meet Monday with the Moslem guerrillas fighting the Soviet-backed Afghan government.

Police shut down art exhibit

BEIJING — Police shut down the largest exhibition of avant-garde art in Communist China's history Sunday, the day it opened, after artists defied a ban on performance art and a sculptor shot her work with a BB gun.

The woman fled but police detained a man who had been with her.

Early Monday, the official Xinhua News Agency said the woman also had been detained and that she and the man were held on suspicion of disturbing public order. Exhibition officials had said they would not let the show reopen until the woman was caught.

As police closed the show shortly before noon, hundreds of spectators and artists spilled into the courtyard in front of the China Art Gallery.

At one point, two carloads of riot police, wearing helmets and toting automatic weapons and tear gas canisters, drove into the crowd. They left immediately after their cars were surrounded by curious onlookers.

"That must be performance art, too," said one artist.

Several artists accused the Public Security Bureau of using the shooting incident as an excuse to shut the exhibition, which was approved by the government after three years of debate.

"We have given them all the justification they need to shut us down," said Su Liqin, an artist in the show. "This is a sad day for art in China."

Police refused to respond to the charges.

"The show has been closed because of problems," said a police official who spoke on condition of anonymity. "Other than that, we have no comment."

Botha resigns, may retire

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Newspapers Sunday said President P.W. Botha, who stepped down as leader of the ruling party last week, may retire soon.

Botha, who suffered a stroke Jan. 18, resigned Thursday as head of the National Party and was replaced the same day by National Education Minister F.W. de Klerk, who is considered Botha's heir apparent as president.

Botha said he will stay on as president, but he has appointed Constitutional Development Minister Chris Heunis as acting president while he recuperates.

Doctors say the 73-year-old Botha is making a rapid recovery but will need at least another month before he can consider returning to work.

Botha was not present for the opening of Parliament in Cape Town on Friday and has not been participating in the government's day-to-day operations, officials have said.

The Sunday Times, the country's largest paper, said that Botha's decision to step down as party chief "is a prelude to complete withdrawal from public life."

Weather shuts down churches

Church services were called off in some Arkansas towns Sunday because of icy roads and the arctic air mass rewrote more low temperature records, but part of Montana warmed above zero for the first time in nearly a week.

The cold chased Mardi Gras revelers in New Orleans into warm bars; marching bands at a Winter Carnival parade in St. Paul, Minn., couldn't put their instruments to their lips, and members of a nudist colony in Texas had to put their clothes on.

At least 32 deaths had been blamed on the weather since arctic air that set low temperature records across Alaska slid into the Lower 48 states Tuesday. In addition, four teen-agers competing in a Wisconsin ice fishing derby were found dead Sunday, apparently from fumes from heaters in their fishing shack.

Bozeman, outside Montana's warming eastern half, was the cold spot of the Lower 48 states Sunday morning at 43 degrees below zero.

Teens die in ice shanty

MANITOWOC, Wis. — Four teen-agers who braved subzero temperatures to participate in an ice-fishing derby this weekend were found dead Sunday in their shanty on Harpt Lake, authorities said.

Manitowoc County Sheriff's Detective Leo Jadowski said the teens were staying overnight at the lake and were overcome by carbon monoxide fumes from two portable propane heaters and a propane hot plate they left running in the 7-foot-by-6½ -foot plywood shanty erected on the ice.

"The cause of death for all four victims was lethal doses of carbon monoxide," Jadowski said. "It's a small ice shanty unit and the carbon monoxide must have filled it. They had portable propane units for heating."

Officials said they had not determined if the heaters were malfunctioning or just were poorly vented. The victims were identified as a girl and three boys, all age 16 or 17 and all from Mishicot, Jadowski said. The names were not immediately released pending notification of relatives.

Dog owners to paw for treat

DETROIT — A suburban Detroit ice cream distributor thinks dog owners will be pawing to get their hands on a new product about to hit the market.

Seymour Greenstein of Golden Valley Dairy in Oak Park is pushing a non-dairy "ice cream" for dogs that will be sold in area markets beginning Monday.

"There's a lot of giggling and tee-heeing about it," said Bob Grayson, Golden Valley's vice president for sales and marketing. "But they (retailers) are buying it."

"Make no bones about it," Greenstein said. "We expect a lot of sales." Frosty Paws, made by an Ohio company, will sell in packages of three or four cups each, Greenstein said. The ingredients do not include milk, which upsets dogs' stomachs. Instead, the treat contains soy flour, dry whey and no less than 7 percent crude fat.

The item will be sold in the ice cream section of the markets, not with other pet foods.

Engineering school rejection best for system, regent says

By Darren Keller
Collegian Reporter

The Kansas Board of Regents' rejection of the proposal that would have made K-State the state's comprehensive engineering school was a decision that was the best for the regents system, according to one regent.

Norman Jeter, regent, said members of the board believe rejecting the proposal presented by consultants will allow time for the review of a selective admissions program for the engineering schools.

The regents rejected a recommendation that would formally designate K-State as the comprehensive engineering school for Kansas at their Jan. 19 meeting.

Robert Creighton, presiding regent, said that after extensive discussion of recommendations from all three engineering schools in Kansas, the regents decided it would not be suitable for K-State to act as the prevailing one.

"There were many recommendations to discuss about the engineering schools and not all of them were passed by the board," he said. "It is not appropriate to designate any Kansas school as the comprehensive engineering school in the state at this time.

"Recent surveys show that students are woefully short in science and math, and all engineering schools should be beefed up for the demand for engineering down the road."

Donald Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering, said three highly accredited engineering consultants were hired to review the engineering schools in Kansas and submitted a report to the regents.

He said the regents added their own thoughts and comments to the report.

"I feel that much of what was recommended (by the consultants) was not formally adopted by the regents," Rathbone said. "The board just didn't want to give an unfair advantage to any school.

"If we want strong programs in the state, we can't have too many programs. If all the resources were at one school, it would be a tremendous program."

The regents also rejected a proposal to discontinue the Architectural Engineering program at the University of Kansas.

The proposal stated there is "unnecessary duplication of the architectural engineering programs" at K-State and KU.

Stanley Koplik, executive director of the board, said the regents believe the programs are equally in demand.

"Both programs are well-enrolled, of high quality and serve Kansas in a responsive way," he said. "There are many prospective employers for graduates from both schools and there wouldn't be any real savings in closing the KU program."

Richard Dodderidge, regents chairman, said KU had an "oversupply of applications" to its architectural engineering program.

"The quality of graduates is high and there are plenty of available jobs (for KU architectural engineering students)," he said.

The last proposal concerning K-State was to transfer the current engineering technology programs from K-State to the Kansas College of Technology in Salina.

KCT would then contract with private institutions in its area or other regents universities for available courses which are required for engineering technology baccalaureates. This proposal was also rejected.

Probation figures increase

By Jill McMahan
Collegian Reporter

The number of students on academic probation for the 1988 fall semester is up 14 percent from the 1987 fall semester.

Charlotte Pfaff, records supervisor for the Registrar's office, said 2,782 students were placed on academic probation last semester. A year ago, 2,403 students were on academic probation.

The K-State general catalog for 1988-1990 defines probation as an academic warning received by a student in academic difficulty and could lead to dismissal from the University.

Pfaff said a student must have been put on probation the previous semester to be dismissed. Dismissal is based on the cumulative grade point average.

If they do not meet the grade requirements, undergraduate students may be placed on academic probation for an indefinite period of time by an academic dean.

"As a general rule, you need to maintain a cumulative GPA of 2.0," Pfaff said. "If it drops below a 2.0, it is grounds for dismissal."

According to the registrar's office, 1,051 freshmen, 592 sophomores, 500 juniors and 442 seniors were placed on academic probation.

Students who neglect their academic responsibilities may be dismissed at any time on recommendation of the academic dean, according to the general catalog.

The registrar's office reported 125 freshmen, 82 sophomores, 69 juniors and 60 seniors dismissed for the spring 1989 semester.

Virginia Moxley, associate dean of the College of Human Ecology, said the number of students on probation is far higher than what she'd like.

Of the 1,150 students enrolled in the College of Human Ecology for the fall 1988 semester, 208 were placed on academic probation and 22 dismissed, Moxley said.

"With the University having an open enrollment policy, the range of academic abilities will vary greatly," she said.

Immediately after grades are posted, a letter is sent to each student who is placed on probation, Moxley said. The letter urges students to meet with their advisers and lists academic and personal sources of help available to students.

Recommended services on campus are the University Counseling Center, the Academic Assistance Center and academic advisers, she said.

"For some students who utilize the facilities, it helps," Moxley said. "But most students on probation do not use the services that are available to them."

An adviser is a link to campus and can help a student make decisions concerning the student's academic career, she said.

Moxley said the college has tried active programs to help students who get into academic trouble. The problem is most students are not good at time management.

"Students don't find the time for their studies," Moxley said, "so they don't find it for special programs."

Larry Erpelding, associate director of resident instruction for the College of Agriculture, said the college sends a letter to students on probation urging them to meet with their academic advisers.

The College of Agriculture placed 227 students on academic probation and dismissed 47. During the fall 1988 semester, 1,541 students were enrolled.

"The academic adviser can help in terms of study skills, working through personal problems and helping the student decide if they're in the right place," Erpelding said.

Each semester, the college has a meeting for its academic advisers, he said. The meeting helps advisers discover new ways to deal with students in need of help.

"As advisers they need to know how they can best advise the students who are in academic trouble," Erpelding said.

Students spend summer traveling through Europe

By Mindy Robert
Collegian Reporter

Three men traveling through 10 countries in Europe does not seem out of the ordinary, but for three K-Staters, the experience was unique.

Scott Pashman, senior in construction science; Richard Patterson, junior in chemical engineering; and Joe Jerashen, a former K-State student, spent about three months hitchhiking across Europe and sleeping wherever they found a place to stay.

"Hitchhiking was one of the highlights of the trip," Patterson said. "We wouldn't even think about taking trains because hitching was so much easier."

It took an average of five to 10 minutes to get a ride from a person driving along the road, Patterson said.

"People would pull over before we put our signs out," he said.

The group slept in parks, train stations, airports and barns to reduce lodging expenses, Patterson said. They even slept in a gazebo in the prince of Belgium's backyard.

"Once in a while we'd splurge (and pay for lodging)," Pashman said.

The three men spent several nights in youth hostels, which charged a small fee for boarding.

Each of the men spent about $10 each day, Patterson said. The biggest expense was food because travel, room and board were usually free.

Pashman said the trip was "kind of a dare."

"Rich was looking at books of Switzerland, and he said, 'Do you want to go to Switzerland?'" Pashman said.

At first, he thought Patterson and Jerashen were crazy, but as the three looked at books, the trip became appealing, Pashman said.

"The more we thought about it, the more we realized that (considering) the value of our time after we graduate, we would not get a chance to do it again, especially the way we did it," Patterson said.

Each of the men lived in different locations during the summer and did not communicate more than twice before the trip to confirm the plans, Patterson said.

"Nobody could actually believe we were going to do it, until we all three got to New York," Pashman said.

The three met in New York and flew to London on Aug. 11, Patterson said.

"We went without return tickets, and whenever we ran out of money, we'd come home," he said.

Each of the men took a German language course at K-State before the trip, Patterson said.

Pashman had had two years of Spanish in high school, and Patterson took a German language course at the University of Rhode Island.

Their foreign language background was of minimal assistance for communicating with the drivers during the trip. While they hitchhiked, 75 percent of the drivers could not speak English, Pashman said.

"(After leaving England) we got to Belgium, and no one spoke English," he said.

"It scared the hell out of us at first," Pashman said. "I thought 'what are we going to do?'"

The map became their Bible, Patterson said.

"Many times we would get into a car, and there would be zero communication," he said. "We couldn't speak the driver's language, and they couldn't speak ours. All we could do was point to a place on a map and nod yes or no."

Although the three had difficulty communicating with the drivers, Pashman said they were able to get know the European people from the drivers.

"It was the people we met that made the trip," he said.

Patterson said Manuel, a man from Spain, gave him a ride from Bordeaux, France to Biarritz, France.

"(Manuel said,) 'Look me up when you come to Spain, and I'll put you and your friends up,'" Patterson said. "He let us stay with him for five days. He fed us and showed us all over the town.

"(Manuel) showed us things we wouldn't see on our own — culture, nightlife. This is stuff a tour agency or travel agency couldn't come close to setting up."

Patterson said when the three traveled through West Germany, they slept in a bed almost every night because the people giving them rides took the three travelers to their homes.

"Lots of times (I was) picked up, taken home and fed supper and then taken back to the highway," Pashman said.

He received rides from 104 different people during the trip. The only bad experience Pashman had was with a man who wanted to stay and travel with him.

Patterson said he had no bad experiences while hitchhiking; however, getting a ride for one person was easier than for all three men, so the group would split each day. A date, time and the meeting location would be decided, and each person

New hazing violations should prompt changes

As the most recent wave of greek initiations pass, the usual rumors of hazing atrocities have flooded the campus.

The Interfraternity Council and Panhellenic Council are to be commended for imposing strict sanctions upon two houses, Beta Theta Pi and Alpha Delta Pi, for their violations of the Greek Affairs Hazing Policy.

Our society has matured to the point where hazing in any form should no longer be tolerated. Physical and emotional cruelty cannot be justified under any circumstances.

Unfortunately, the structure of most greek organizations continues to promote such abuses. Tradition and a deep desire to "fit in" make it a difficult cycle to break.

Hazing, by its formal definition, is certainly not limited to sororities and fraternities. Indeed, physical and emotional abuse occurs in residence halls and other group situations. Little can be done to change human nature.

But, by abandoning the outdated concept of "pledges," fraternities and sororities can eliminate much of the organized abuse that stems from tradition; a need to "do unto others" what was done to them.

Greek houses at K-State should follow the example of Lambda Chi Alpha, which has done away with pledges, and has developed a program of "associate" members.

The associates are not considered active members, must hold study hours, and learn the usual history and traditions of the house. But the idea that they are "subordinates" or second-class persons has been renounced.

Fraternities and sororities have much to offer. They improve campus life, benefit the community, and enrich the lives of their members. Hazing is a cancerous cyst on these otherwise healthy and growing bodies, and may require some surgery to remove. But for the greek system to weaken and die because it ignored the problem would be tragic.

The K-State greek system should take the progressive stance, and become models for the rest of the nation to follow. Other campuses have outlawed greek houses entirely because of hazing incidents; such a consequence would be a great loss.

The system can continue to be defended and incidents covered up, or a positive change can be made for maturity as a University community.

Poor sportsmanship hurts team's image

K-State basketball fans pushed their team support to the limit at the recent University of Oklahoma game. So far to the limit that the legendary "sixth man" nearly contributed a technical foul to the Wildcat effort.

We often boast of our school as the friendly University — the one that in the past has won good sportsmanship awards for our polite crowd support.

The only message K-State fans were successful in getting across to the television audience was the red-neck, let's go harrass some sheep image — the one image the University does not want high school seniors or wealthy alumni to have to view in their living rooms.

Lon Kruger shouldn't have had to grab a microphone in the middle of an intense basketball game and plead with fans to quit throwing ice on the court.

Throwing objects on the basketball court is not only dangerous, it interferes with the game. It breaks the team's momentum, and could cause injury to the players on the court.

It could also very easily cost our favorite basketball team a dreaded technical.

"Flipping the bird" to the Oklahoma basketball team members is not going to win a game, either (no matter how rude the other team is acting). And attacking another team's mascot won't get the 'Cats another three-pointer when they need it the most. It will, however, keep reinforcing K-State's student body image as being a bunch of riot-loving hicks who didn't possess enough social graces to go to KU.

Grow up, K-State sports fans. It's time to put the pride back into our image.

1970s revival not far away

Commentary

Chad L. Sanborn
Collegian Columnist

There has to be a bunch of you out there who are just like me, although maybe not as obnoxious, who have seen the coming of the 1970s revival. Yeah, I can't wait, either.

Ask any red-blooded American about any decade but the 70s and you'll get a fond memory type of response. For example:

"The 1920s? You mean the Roaring Twenties don'cha, ya young whipper snapper? Those were the days. Prohibition, gangsters, Babe Ruth and the Yankees. Heck, a Snickers bar only cost a nickel."

Or ...

"The '50s were an awakening of the American youth. The baby boomers were the first teen-agers to have spending power, thus producers created a supply in hopes of profiting from the 'boomers' market, such as the demand for rock 'n' roll, cars and Hula-hoops."

Or even the most recent nostalgic drivel ...

"The '60s were so funky, man. Now you can't even get a groovy hit of acid, but back then it flowed like the earth's own water from a natural spring. Man, where's my Freedom Rock CDs?"

But just mention the 1970s — our cultural dark age of gaudy clothes, rampant inflation and that horrid disco stuff — and people's mouths purse like they've been sucking lemons. Soon they fall to the ground shaking in shame and begging forgiveness through gnashing teeth.

But the television wasn't that bad.

The 1976-77 season was probably the best, not just for the '70s, but for the entire history of TV entertainment. The nation was just coming off its big 200th birthday bash and was ready to settle down in front of the idiot box for some serious nonsense.

It's easy to forget everything that went on in that stupendous season of boob tubing.

In that season, "Battle of the Network Stars" premiered. Teams of stars from ABC, NBC and CBS (respectively captained by Gabe "Kotter" Kaplan, Telly "Kojak" Savalas and Robert "Male Chauvinist Pig" Conrad) sweated, grunted and posed through such grueling events as the canoe race and the "throw the softball to dunk the bimbo" contest.

In that season, if you felt the urge, you could see: Sanford and Son make ethnic jokes; Chico and the Man make ethnic jokes, (it seems so long ago, but yes, that was before Freddie Prinze bought the farm); and see everybody on Happy Days make fun of white people, a sort of sick ethnic humor.

In that season, Nancy "The Quicker Picker Upper" Walker had two shows premiere and two shows bomb. First in September 1976 there was The Nancy Walker Show, which lasted until December of that same year.

Always the fighter, Walker was back in February 1977 with Blansky's Beauties. The show, a sitcom set around the producer of shows at a Las Vegas hotel, crapped out in May of the same year.

Also in that season, if you wanted, you could see "Charlie's Angels," "Baretta" and "Starsky and Hutch" almost every Wednesday night. If that lineup wasn't working for you, you must have had a bruised brain.

In that season, which could be known as "the" season of the variety show, you and your entire family could sit down with chicken pot pies and be entertained by Donnie and Marie, Bobby Goldsboro, Bobby Vintin (aren't they the same guy?), Captain and Tennille, Carol Burnett, Dolly Parton, Don Ho, Porter Wagner, Sheilds and Yarnell, Sonny and Cher, Tony Orlando and Dawn, and the ever present and ever amusing (but for all the wrong reasons) "Hee Haw."

Talk about movies on television in that season, my word.

Do you realize it's been more than a dozen years since the first airing of the now cult classic "The Boy in the Plastic Bubble"? And how about "Smash-up on Interstate 5" or "SST — Death Flight"? But wait, there's more. There were also all of those "Walking Tall" movies, "I Want to Keep My Baby" movies, and "Smile Jenny, You're Dead."

In that season there was a bunch of informative and entertaining stuff on PBS, but no one watched it.

Also in that season, peanut magnate Jimmy "Wanna Buy a Canal?" Carter, kicked the dog poop out of celebrity pro-am regular President Gerald Ford to become our leader.

The television news media responded with such hard-hitting shows as: "Election '76: The President from the Plains," and "Campaign '76: What Happened Last Night." (If it wanted to be really informative, it should have been titled "Campaign '76: What Happened Last Night?").

In that season, game show host Bob Barker still had black hair and didn't force his pet population gibberish on us. Richard Dawson, who does have a normal sized head, was still the big wig on "Family Feud." And best of all, "Match Game" was on twice a day.

In that season, 1976-77 B.P.W. (Before Pee Wee), Saturday mornings were still worth getting up for. Of course, I wasn't of legal drinking age then.

There was "The Scooby-Doo/Dynomutt Hour" (Look Raggy, rootrints!), "The Tom & Jerry/Grape Ape/Mumbly Show" and, the ultimate, "Jabberjaw."

So when the '70s revival hits — look for it in about three years — we can only hope many of these and other gems from the good old days will go the way of "Leave it to Beaver" and "I Love Lucy."

Me? I'll be good for the go when they rebroadcast "Ann-Margret ... Rhinestone Cowgirl."

Letters

Editor's note: The following is a copy of a letter to the editor of the University of Oklahoma newspaper and the K-State Collegian as well as the Norman, Okla., newspaper.

Rude Sooners

Editor,

I am a K-State student who attended the Oklahoma vs. K-State basketball game on Feb. 1 and I am writing to voice my opinion of your basketball team. Perhaps you would better understand if I told you the story from the start.

Upon arriving at K-State's Bramlage Coliseum, we discovered the usual few drunken fans shouting insults at the Sooners.

Now, although this is a common occurrence at away games, some of your players began shouting back at the crowd and inviting them down to the court. Although it is rare for a visiting team to act like this, most of the sober fans understood their anger.

During the last few minutes of the game, as the Sooners began to pull away, the players on your bench engaged in the following: genital grabbing, finger flipping, scoreboard pointing, and a host of other childish activities including waving goodbye and inviting fans down to the floor to fight.

When someone was finally angered enough to throw a roll of toilet paper at the Sooner bench, they began whining for a technical foul. Correct me if I am wrong, but attempting to incite a riot at an opponent's home court is also worthy of at least one tech.

The thousands of K-State fans who witnessed the Sooner antics, as well as the tens of thousands who witnessed them on television, were probably as offended, if not more so, by your team's behavior. I found your players to be immature jerks who know they are No. 1, but cannot deal with the fact that everyone wants a shot at the top spot.

Unfortunately, every team that fails to defeat your team will have to deal not only with the disappointment, but with the nearly uncontrollable urge to storm the court and beat the Sooners into a bloody pulp.

To the Sooners: Sooner or later your arrogance and rudeness will give an opponent that added incentive to beat your socks off, and then you will no longer be No. 1. My only wish for your team is that you never again have to hear 13,500 voices chanting, "No class!"

Target practice

Editor,

Target practice? Target practice?! Target practice?!!

Excuse me, but you don't buy an AK-47 just to go out and shoot target practice.

And just what, may I ask, would you practice shooting at? Ducks? Those sure are some big ducks. Or do they sell child-size targets, available in 5-, 8- and 10-year-old sizes?

The AK-47 and similar machine guns are made to kill humans. So until our society can get its attitude adjusted, as Mark Anspach calls for, then shouldn't we take these guns off the market?

Democrats prepare for pay raise battle

By The Associated Press

WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS, W.Va. — House Democrats tried to buck up their courage Sunday as they wrapped up a weekend retreat and looked toward Capitol Hill battles over a proposed 51 percent pay raise.

"When we face re-election in 22 months, no one will be defeated because of that issue," Rep. Beryl Anthony, D-Ark., chairman of the House Democratic campaign committee, told his colleagues. "When you address the issue head-up, the people will understand it. We will survive."

Rep. Steny Hoyer, D-Md., appearing on CBS' "Face the Nation," reminded the television audience four times that it was President Reagan who proposed raising congressional salaries from $89,500 to $135,000, and that President Bush endorsed it.

However, Hoyer said House Speaker Jim Wright "is confronted with an environment atmosphere of a great deal of hypocrisy, very frankly, as well as hysteria and demagoguery. Any time a pay raise is before the Congress, there's a great deal of indignation and it's hard for the Congress to deal with that issue."

At their weekend conference at the luxurious Greenbrier resort, members tried to bowl, swim, ride, shoot, skate, drink, dance, talk, eat, jog, putt, swing and pray their blues away.

But many rank-and-file lawmakers said that while it was a great family outing, it did not alleviate their dread of the looming pay battle.

"We got the news this weekend that we've got an appointment for a root canal every day this week," said Rep. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., who was among those hoping Wright would find a way to dispose of the pay raise issue.

"I would like this execution to be swift. I don't want to bleed to death," Durbin said, adding that 75 percent of his constituents said in a survey they would consider the pay raise a major issue in the next election.

On "Face the Nation," Sen. Gordon Humphrey, R-N.H., said, "This pay raise is an affront to the American people, both with respect to the amount and, in particular, the method by which Congress is going about trying to get this without ever having to record a vote or hold itself accountable to the American people."

Under the law, the pay raise goes into effect for members of Congress, federal judges, and top executive branch officials on Wednesday unless both chambers of Congress have voted it down.

Women treated for frostbite

Group found riding boxcar in Missouri

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Two Salvadoran women were hospitalized with frostbite Sunday after riding in a boxcar for 2½ days with only some blankets and a frozen gallon of milk.

The women, and four others from El Salvador, all cold and hungry, were discovered Friday afternoon as they left a boxcar in a North Kansas City railroad yard.

The five women and one man, who spoke only Spanish, said they had been riding the train in an attempt to reach a relative and possible work in Washington, D.C.

"They were just froze," said Ida Barry, assistant manager of a restaurant near the rail yard where the Salvadorans were first taken in from the cold. "Cold isn't even the word for it."

Juana Isabel Duarte, 38, and Lorena Parada, 21, were listed in stable condition Sunday at Truman Medical Center with frostbite of their feet and legs.

Another woman, Ascencion Torres, 23, was released after treatment.

Torres and the three others were staying with a Kansas City woman while they waited for their traveling companions to be released from the hospital.

Speaking through an interpreter, the Salvadorans said Saturday they were fleeing poverty and fighting in El Salvador. They said they hoped to get jobs and earn enough money to buy food for their children. They said the children were left behind with friends and relatives.

The Salvadorans said they had been traveling 31 days and had twice been turned back by authorities before reaching Kansas City.

Only the man, who asked that his name not be printed for fear of political reprisals, holds permit papers to work in the United States.

The six ranged in ages from 21 to 38, according to an interpreter and hospital officials. The group includes the man, his wife, her sister, his sister and two unrelated women. Among them, they said, they left 15 children in El Salvador.

Three of the women said their husbands had been killed or had disappeared within the last two years in El Salvador.

The plight of six became known Friday afternoon when Kenneth Bishop, a special agent for the Norfolk & Western Railway Co., saw them stumbling out of an open boxcar.

Bishop, who said he was prohibited from talking to reporters, spent nearly three hours on the phone Friday, trying to locate immigration or social services agencies to help the Salvadorans, witnesses said.

Bishop's efforts to locate assistance finally ended with a call to the Don Bosco Community Center. Assistant Director Marilyn Anson sent caseworker Toni Valdez, who speaks Spanish, to the rail yard.

"We're not trying to mess with immigration or make a political statement," Anson said. "We're just trying to do the humanitarian thing."

When Valdez first encountered the Salvadorans, she said they could hardly walk and two of the women appeared to be ill.

Play addresses sex topics

Caryl Churchill started toying with the idea to write a play about sexual politics in 1978 after a theatrical workshop focused on the issue.

"Cloud 9" addresses stereotypes and role reversals, and talks openly about sex and sexual preferences. The play is full of erotic tensions and by the end of the second act, confessions of the characters' true feelings for one another are exposed.

The play is about respecting different ways of life and understanding how to accept others by realizing that not everyone's cloud nine is the same.

It starts in Victorian Africa in the 1880s and ends in London a century later. The first act evokes discussion and is more entertaining because of its humor. The era and social interaction of the characters add lightness to help balance the weighted issues of sex, slavery, and oppression.

Cross-gender casting is being revived in modern day productions. Four of the actors portray characters that are not of their gender and for the most part, are believable and add diversity to the production.

Geoffrey Kaufman, graduate in speech, played Betty in act one and Martin in act two. His feminine qualities were nothing less than proper and very believable.

Maria Santucci, freshman in theater, was cast as Edward in the first act and Victoria in the second. Her perceptions of Edward, a sexually abused boy, were a bit abrasive. Santucci's portrayal of Victoria was more refined making the character more pleasant to watch.

Matthew Mazur, sophomore in theatre, who played Harry Bagley in act one and Annette Blanke, graduate in speech, who played Ellen, colorfully evoked homosexuality in the first act and were both cast as opposite genders in the second act.

Mazur's character, Harry Bagley, had a personal obligation to sex. His lines were full of tempestuous passages referring to lovemaking. As Cathy in the second act, Mazur looked the part in pink lace bloomers. A 6-foot-4-inch male, his size accentuated the point that children can often times be overbearing.

All the characters were slapped with psychological jolts and their reactions were not always conventional and at times, not always convincing.

"Cloud 9" is funny. It doesn't try to sermonize about morality, rather it simply shows the struggle of adhering to the presures of society.

Pat Foltz, graduate in theater, played Mrs. Saunders in act one and Betty in act two. She added astoundingly effective climactic scenes and made the switch from

OSU stuns top-ranked Sooners

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Basketball fans slack-jawed over Oklahoma State's conquest of No. 1 might stop to ponder an even deeper mystery.

How could Oklahoma State lose on Wednesday night to one of the weakest teams this side of Division II and turn around on Saturday and beat one of the best?

Oklahoma Coach Billy Tubbs, whose ride atop the rankings shall last exactly one week, may have the answer. At the end Saturday of O-State's 77-73 victory, Tubbs reminded his questioners that where a basketball game is played has bearing on how it is played.

Oklahoma State lost 102-86 Wednesday to Colorado, which entered the week with a 5-13 record and a ranking of either last or next-to-last in seven of nine Big Eight team statistics.

But that game was at Colorado. Saturday's game was at Oklahoma State, and was Oklahoma's fourth road assignment in six games.

"The road may have caught up with us today," Tubbs said. "They made the right plays down the stretch. We didn't."

Oklahoma has still never played a game at home as No. 1. At Stillwater Saturday, the Sooners, 18-3, 5-1, failed to score in the final 2:50 and missed the front end of two crucial one-and-ones.

Meanwhile, the Cowboys, who have only one senior on the roster, played like the poised, experienced unit that would be expected of a top-ranked squad.

"I thought we played with an extreme amount of poise," said Oklahoma State coach Leonard Hamilton, whose team improved to 13-6 and 4-2.

Freshman forward Byron Houston, who nearly went to K-State, scored five straight points in the final three minutes, including a tip-in off a missed free throw that gave the Cowboys a 72-71 lead, and a short jumper in the lane that made it 75-73 with 1:35 remaining. Houston finished with 11 points, 12 rebounds and six of the Cowboys' Big Eight record 16 blocked shots.

"When Houston went in and got the tip-in and (Richard) Dumas got the rebound after a missed free throw, those were the plays I thought made the difference down the stretch," Hamilton said. Dumas led Oklahoma State with 19 points and 13 rebounds while Tony Martin led Oklahoma with 22 points.

The Big Eight's other two home-standing teams were also winners in an abbreviated weekend of action. Nebraska overcame a Kansas rally to beat the Jayhawks 74-70 and end the league's longest losing streak. And No. 5 Missouri beat K-State 73-68 to stake a claim of its own to No. 1.

The Tigers are the first to reach 20 victories, standing 20-3 overall and in first place in the league at 6-0. They are certain to move up in this week's rankings and could make a strong argument for the No. 1 that is certain to be taken back from Tubbs' Sooners.

Big half lifts Lady Cats, 96-78

By Mike Rouse
Collegian Reporter

The K-State women's basketball team avenged an earlier 82-75 loss to the Missouri Tigers by defeating them Saturday night, 96-78, in Bramlage Coliseum.

"We played pretty darn good," K-State coach Matilda Mossman said. "Despite our turnovers, we had a very good game."

The game was important to the Lady Cats because, besides being a home game, to win it would mean K-State would have sole possession of second place in the Big Eight Conference — two games behind league-leading Colorado and two ahead of third-place Missouri.

"Every game is important. You don't want to try and put yourself in a hole with a home loss," Mossman said.

Junior Stephanie Lane came off the bench and scored a career-high 15 points for the Lady Cats. Lane also added five rebounds and two blocked shots.

"Stephanie Lane made a big difference; she established some things for us," Mossman said.

"I was waiting for my chance to get on the floor and tried to make the most of it, " Lane said. "I prepared myself more for this game because it was Missouri."

Diana Miller had a double-double night scoring 20 points and grabbing a season-high 12 rebounds. Nadira Hazim scored 16 points and Rita Matteucci scored 14 as the Lady Cats extended their streak in which four or more players have scored in double figures to six games.

Staff/Joe Freeman

The Lady Cats celebrate during the last few seconds of their game against Missouri. The Lady Cats are 6-2 in conference action.

"We have a lot of people who can score in double figures, so other teams can't decide who they are going to guard," Miller said.

The Lady Cats shot only 42 percent from the field in the first half but still owned a six-point halftime lead. K-State led by as many as seven twice in the first half, while Missouri managed to grab a one-point lead on two occasions in the opening period.

The second half was a completely different story. The Lady Cats scored the first nine points and Missouri was never able to get within single-digit range again. K-State scored a season-high 57 points in the second half.

"In the second half, we were able to run the fast break at our speed," Mossman said.

"We wanted to take it to them," Miller said. "We weren't going to let them catch up with us."

Missouri did go on a 13-4 run late in the second half to narrow the lead to 87-75 with 1:27 left.

"I knew time was on our side. I felt like we still had the contest in hand when they made the run at us," she said.

Missouri was led by Sandie Prophete, who scored a game-high 30 points. Lisa Sandbothe added 12 points and 10 rebounds for Missouri, who dropped to 13-8 overall and 4-4 in the Big Eight.

K-State, 16-5 overall and 6-2 in the Big Eight, will see action again at 7 p.m. Wednesday at Iowa State.

Iowa, Arizona, Georgetown all pick up wins

By The Associated Press

Former No. 1 Illinois again felt the hammer at Iowa Sunday as the Hawkeyes handed it an 86-82 loss.

Ed Horton had 26 points and 17 rebounds and Matt Bullard gave Iowa a big lift in his first game in eight weeks in Big Ten Conference action.

Iowa used a 17-2 run to rally from an eight-point deficit in the first half, then pulled away in the second half behind the scoring of Horton and B.J. Armstrong after Illinois had battled back to tie the game.

Armstrong finished with 24 points, 11 in the final eight minutes, and Roy Marble scored 18 as the Hawkeyes improved to 17-4 overall and 5-3 in the Big Ten. Bullard, a 6-foot-10 forward had been out since Dec. 12 with torn ligaments in his left knee, had six rebounds and eight points, including a pair of 3-pointers.

Illinois, 18-3 and 5-3, lost for the third time in four games since starting guard Kendall Gill was sidelined with a broken bone in his left foot. Nick Anderson led the Illini with 25 points, reserve P.J. Bowman scored 18 and Stephen Bardo 15.

Here is a brief recap of other Top 20 action:

At Arizona, Sean Elliott scored 21 points and No. 4 Arizona finished with a flurry to beat Washington 85-68 in a Pacific-10 Conference matchup.

At Philadelphia, Jaren Jackson scored 27 points, but it was a stifling man-to-man defense that lifted sixth-ranked Georgetown to a 69-55 victory over Villanova in a Big East Conference game.

It's time to give the Big Eight some recognition

Svoboda on Sports

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Columnist

Everyone who's sick and Goddarn tired of hearing about the Big East, ACC and the Big Ten as the dominant conferences in college basketball, raise your right hand.

OK, everyone who's reading this column, you can lower that hand now.

Well, maybe not everyone is tired of hearing about those three "powerhouse" basketball conferences. Maybe there's a reader or two out there from Indiana who worships Big Ten basketball like we Big Eighters tend to love football.

If so, you probably won't want to finish this column, for this is the story of the best kept secret in college basketball — the Big Eight Conference.

No, Georgetown's Alonzo Mourning isn't strutting his stuff as a freshman in this conference, but Missouri's Anthony Peeler is. No, mighty Georgetown isn't dominating the league, but Missouri sure is.

And no, there may not be seven "legitimate" NCAA tourney teams in the conference, as the Big Ten claims to have, but there are surely more than the two most people outside Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri, Oklahoma, Colorado and Iowa know about.

Who was the No. 1 team in the nation last week? Yep, those jerks from down in Norman, the Oklahoma Sooners. No one said I had to like them, but you can't deny that this Big Eight entry is one of the top teams in the land.

Who was No. 5 last week and a strong candidate to replace Oklahoma as the nation's top team when the polls are released this morning? That's right, old Stormin' Norman and the boys of mighty Mizzou. Don't like them much either, but purple blood tends to lessen one's tolerance for Sooners, Tigers and Jayhawks.

And what about Oklahoma State, Kansas and our own K-State Wildcats? Oklahoma State, you might remember, is the team that knocked the cocky Sooners from their perch on Saturday. Kansas, though on probation and thus not eligible for the NCAA's post-season party, was ranked nationally before hitting it's own "Burma Road" last week in the form of K-State, Missouri and Nebraska.

As for K-State, you can draw your own conclusions. The record isn't all that flashy, but I defy anyone in the country to play Oklahoma and Missouri in the same week and come out looking as good as the Wildcats did last week.

Therein lies the Big Eight's biggest problem. There are just too many good teams and good athletes in this emerging conference. Unlike the Big Ten, ACC and Big East, which have established their sphere of dominance with national championships and the like, the Big Eight is just a babe in the woods at this point.

Until the Oklahomas and Missouris of the world are consistently making trips to the Final Four, no one is going to respect Big Eight basketball.

And I hate to tell you this folks, but those days are not far from being here. Oklahoma and Missouri are a leg up on the competition now, but Oklahoma State, Kansas and K-State show no signs of backing down from the fight.

In fact, those three teams are fighting hard, and each time they knock off one of the "Big Two," it's perceived nationally as a sign the conference isn't as strong as some of the others nationwide.

Why, then, is it that when Providence rises up and knocks off a Syracuse or Georgetown, or that when Minnesota downs Illinois or Indiana, or when Wake Forest beats Duke or North Carolina that no one takes a pot shot at the conferences those teams play in?

It's ignorance, plain and simple. Danny Manning and Mitch Richmond, the NCAA Player of the Year last year and the NBA's likely Rookie of the Year this season, played in the Big Eight. One of this season's likely top five NBA draft choices, Stacey King of Oklahoma, is considered one of the top three players in the land, along with Arizona's Sean Elliott and Duke's Danny Ferry.

And Oklahoma, Missouri, Kansas and K-State have all made recent trips to the NCAA tourney, with OU, KU and K-State all making the Final Eight last year. Kansas defeated Oklahoma, you will remember, for the title last year.

Don't think there were any Big Ten or Big East teams in Kansas City last year, were there? Nope.

I'll give Illinois, Iowa, Indiana, North Carolina, Duke, Georgetown, Syracuse and the other teams that toil in the three conferences I've mentioned their due. They're all fine teams in fine conferences playing good basketball.

Now it's time those across the country, including folks who live in the states where those three conferences are king, give the Big Eight their due as well.

If they don't, they're likely to be sorry at tournament time this season and for several years to come. Maybe then the mighty Big Eight will earn the respect it deserves.

This is a "prime time conference, baby!"

'Cats fade late in 73-68 loss at Mizzou

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

COLUMBIA, Mo. — Considering a height advantage averaging nearly five inches at almost every position, it's really not a wonder that No. 5 Missouri defeated K-State, 73-68, at the Hearnes Center Saturday.

The real wonder might be that the smaller 'Cats nearly pulled off a Big Eight Conference victory on the road, despite the fact that the Tigers out-rebounded them 39-29.

"Obviously, a big part of the game was the offensive rebounding," K-State coach Lon Kruger said. "They were able to take advantage of their second-shot opportunities."

Taking advantage in a big way was Missouri's 7-foot-1 Gary Leonard. The senior center banged around inside for nine rebounds and 22 points.

"With (Leonard's) size it's hard to get around him and try to front him," Kruger said. "And even when we did get position on him, he's got that little jump hook. He releases it from so high that it's pretty hard for us to stop."

But Leonard was not alone underneath. He got help from two of the Tigers' other frontline players, Doug Smith and Mike Sandbothe. Sandbothe paced the Tigers with 11 rebounds and also had 11 points, while Smith, who missed his first five shots, rallied to finish with 14 points and seven rebounds.

"They took away our three-guard offense, but we're a good enough team that we could adjust," Missouri coach Norm Stewart said. "This team can adapt to whatever the other team is trying to do defensively."

K-State did what it probably thought it had to do in order to beat the Tigers by shutting down the trio of Byron Irvin, Lee Coward and Anthony Peeler, who, combined, started the game averaging nearly 60 points a contest. Collectively, they scored only 20 Saturday.

But Mizzou acted as if it knew just exactly what the 'Cats were thinking and consistently went low all day long, establishing an inside game that K-State couldn't control.

"When you line up with folks (K-State) this size and then combine that with the size of Missouri, then we definitely have to be concerned," Kruger said. "Missouri is obviously very capable inside."

While Missouri dominated the inside game, K-State threw its one-two punch of guards LaKeith Humphrey and Steve Henson at the Tigers. Humphrey seemed nearly unconscious all day long as he consistently quieted the Missouri crowd with a variety of jump shots just inside the three-point arc to end the game tied with Leonard for scoring honors at 22.

Henson, too, delivered key shots at times when it seemed the Tigers were starting to pull away.

"It's really frustrating to feel like we fought pretty hard and gave ourselves a chance to win," Henson said. "We just can't seem to win the close ones.

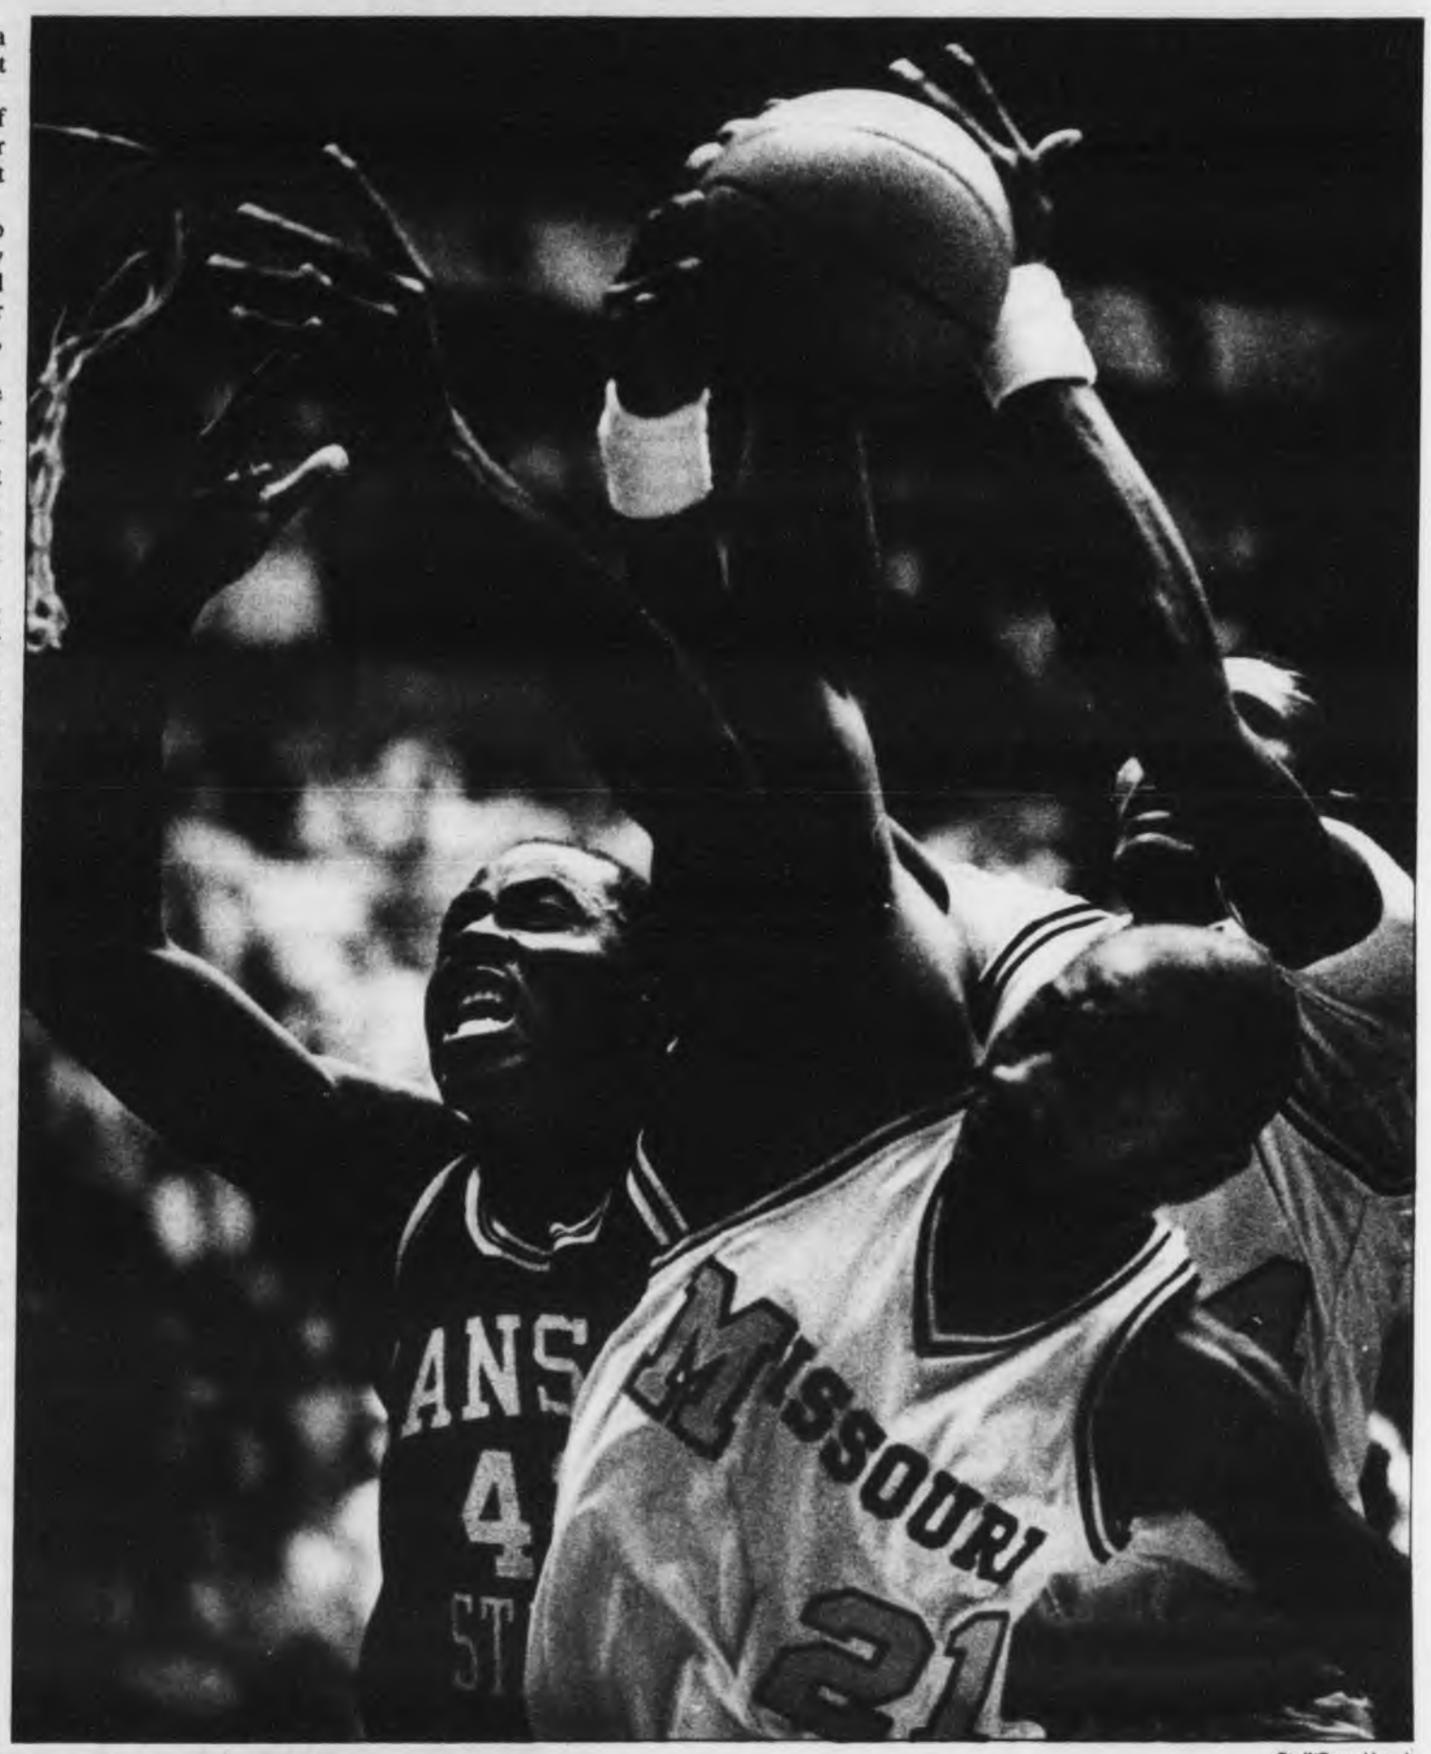
"Last year we would step up at the end of the game and win the close ones, but this year it just seems like we haven't been able to put it together late in the game."

It looked like K-State was finally ready to take that step up Saturday after Fred McCoy hit a jumper and then Humphrey stripped Smith of the inbounds pass. He hit McCoy for an easy layup to take the 'Cats within two, 67-65, with 1:24 remaining.

After a timeout, K-State seemed to be doing just what it wanted when Mark Dobbins fouled Sandbothe to send the Tigers' worst free throw shooter (with a 57 percent average) on the floor to the line with 1:14 left. But Sandbothe didn't do what he was supposed to, and hit both ends of the one-and-one to put Mizzou up, 69-65.

The next play might have been the turning point in the ball game for K-State. After Lance Simmons hit the front end of a one-and-one, he missed his second shot, but came up with his own rebound. The 'Cats had the ball and were down 69-66 with just 59 seconds remaining.

An errant pass went out of bounds, however, after several players had been diving for the loose ball. The ball was awarded to Missouri, which had Kruger quickly off the bench to contest the call, but to no avail.



"There's no doubt in my mind that their player hit it out," Henson said of the controversial call. "I think it was Doug Smith. I'm pretty sure."

"There's no doubt," Kruger said. "Their player threw it in the stands."

From there, K-State was forced to put the Tigers on the line and Missouri answered by canning its last four free throws while K-State could not manage a decent shot on the other end. Missouri had finally sewed up its 20th win.

"When you go on the road and you fight hard but then come out on the short end, there's not much consolation," Kruger said. "The satisfaction of playing hard just diminishes."

K-State's Tony Massop misses a rebound as Missouri's Byron Irvin (21) and Doug Smith pull the ball down. Fifth-ranked Missouri out-rebounded K-State 39-29 and went on to defeat the 'Cats 73-68 at the Hearnes Center in Columbia.

Humphrey outshines Tiger guards

By Mike Goens
Sports Writer

COLUMBIA, Mo. — LaKeith Humphrey went toe to toe with Missouri's guard trio of Lee Coward, Byron Irvin and Anthony Peeler Saturday and came out on top. But even though Humphrey won the battle, Missouri won the war.

Humphrey single handedly outscored the Tigers' celebrated guards 22-20, but Missouri was able to hold off K-State 73-68.

"LaKeith shot awfully well," Coach Lon Kruger said. "The play of LaKeith and Steve (Henson) has been very consistent."

Humphrey scored his career-high 22 points with numerous jump shots and Coward all over him. He made 8-14 from the field including 2-4 from three point range and played all 40 minutes.

K-State's containment of Missouri's guards forced the Tigers to go inside more, in the person of Gary Leonard. Leonard was a point off of his career-high with 22 points on 11 of 15 shooting from the field.

"I think we used our three-center offense today," Missouri Coach Norm Stewart said. "They took away the three-guard offense, but we're a good enough team that we could adjust."

It was the second consecutive impressive game that Humphrey has had against a tough counterpart. On Wednesday night he led K-State with 21 points and held the Oklahoma Sooners' Mookie Blaylock to just 11 points. Coward scored 10 points Saturday, two below his average.

"Those guys don't bother me," Humphrey said. "I just take them as I would any other player."

Humphrey nearly got the 'Cats back into the game when he stripped Doug Smith of the ball on an inbounds pass and Fred McCoy converted a layup to pull K-State within two, 67-65, with 1:24 to play.

Humphrey has now scored in double-figures in 10 of his last 11 games. Since moving into the starting lineup 12 games ago, he has scored in double figures in all but two of those games.

"I just look to add to the team and make us come together if that is what it takes," Humphrey said. "It's not that important to me to score, I'd rather pick up four or five steals."

Humphrey and Henson both say they are playing better together as the season has progressed, and look to create shots for one another.

"Coach Kruger wants me to penetrate and make shots for Steve, and he does the same for me," Humphrey said. "I kind of get in the flow of things as the games go by. It seems we are just a rebound or a shot off, and we come up short.

"Our fight is missing. We need to get out and fight more."

Teaberry qualifies for national meet

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

The K-State track team was scheduled to compete in a triangular meet Saturday at the Bob Devaney Sports Center in Lincoln, Neb., but bad weather forced Arkansas to cancel, leaving the Wildcats to go up against defending Big Eight champion Nebraska alone.

"Even though Arkansas wasn't there, the competition was still good," K-State coach John Capriotti said. "I was really pleased with the way we competed and with the fact that we had several people run their fastest times of the season and also some of the best times of their life."

Nebraska won both divisions, with the men coming out on top 76-54 while the Cornhusker women outdistanced K-State, 65-29.

High jumper Connie Teaberry joined the list of K-Staters to qualify for the NCAA Indoor Championships. The freshman from St. Louis jumped 5-11¼ in winning the event.

"She has been jumping awfully well. She is a very talented girl and it doesn't really surprise me that she qualified," Capriotti said.

Women's sprinters Latricia Joyner and Markeya Jones also turned in solid performances. Joyner finised first in the 55-meter dash with a time of 7.14 seconds, while Jones defeated defending Big Eight champion and national record holder Linnetta Wilson of Nebraska in the 200 meters with a time of 24.32.

"Markeya ran really well and she going to be even better toward the end of the season. She just missed qualifying (for nationals)," Capriotti said.

Kim Kilpatrick also finshed first with a time of 7.86 in the 55-meter hurdles.

The men were led once again by short sprint specialist Ray Hill. Hill took the 55 meters in a season-best 6.21, beating previous Big Eight leader Mark Perry in the process. Hill then turned around and won the 200-meters in 21.43.

Dan O'Mara won the shot put for the third week in a row with a put of 59-10¾ . Other first place finishers for the men were Tyrone Watkins in the 400-meters (48.73), Pat Hessini in the mile (4:06.71), Clifton Etheridge in the long jump (23-3¾), and Chris Samuelson in the high jump (6-10¾).

K-State tennis duos tops at invitational

By Carolyn Holcroft
Sports Writer

The K-State women's tennis team opened its season Saturday and Sunday against Southwest Missouri State, Creighton, and Wichita State in the K-State Doubles Invitational.

In division one play, first place was won by the K-State doubles team of juniors Valerie Rive and Marijke Nel. The duo was successful all weekend, defeating teams from Southwest Missouri 6-0 and 7-5, and shutting out one Wichita State team in two sets before the final match against another Wichita State tandem, which they won after three sets, 6-0, 2-6, and 6-0.

"In the second set we had a little lapse in concentration, and they won it 6-2," Nel said. "It took a little bit of discipline to get back on our feet."

Third place was taken by K-State's team of sophomore Miste Bitner and junior Helen Schildknecht, defeating Southwest Missouri 6-4 and 6-0, and Wichita State 6-4 and 6-2. However, Bitner wasn't pleased with their performance.

"We played good in our first match, but after that we didn't play together," Bitner said. "We played a tough match against Wichita State that we thought we should have won. We just didn't keep our momentum going."

K-State dominated division two play, taking both first and second places. K-State's sophomore Thresa Burcham and junior Sara Hancock defeated Creighton 6-0, 6-1, and Wichita 6-1, 6-2 to advance to the final round against teammates senior Annika Emtell and freshman Tracy Parker. Both Burcham and Hancock agreed that the match seemed more like practice than an actual competition.

"It was competitive, but we've played each other so many times and we know each other's game so well, that it seemed fairly routine," Hancock said. "It wasn't the same as if I was playing against someone I didn't know."

Burcham thought much of the pressure was relieved in the final match.

"I was a lot more relaxed than I would have been if I had been playing another school," Burcham said. "We can concentrate and play good doubles but it just seems like practice."

Emtell and Parker defeated two Creighton teams 6-1, 6-0, and 6-4, 7-5, before losing in the final match to Burcham and Hancock.

As a whole, K-State coach Steve Bietau said he was encouraged by last weekend's performances, and pleased with the way the season started out.

"We answered a lot of the questions that we needed to have answered. I think we have a real clear picture of where the team is at this point," Bietau said. "I think it's an excellent start to the season.

Audience participates in 'Drood'

By Tom McLaughlin
Collegian Reviewer

"The Mystery of Edwin Drood," presented Saturday evening at McCain Auditorium, was successful in presenting a high energy performance that encouraged audience participation.

Unfortunately, the slow-pace of the first act and somewhat loose episodic structure of the show hampered the overall effectiveness of the hard-working ensemble.

The musical opens with a montage of nineteenth century characters introducing themselves while mingling in the audience.

The characters, responsible for chatting with different sections of the audience, enhanced the pre-show excitement by leading chants of the musical's title.

The pre-show activity was also effective as the characters encouraged and taught their section of the audience to boo, hiss and applaud in melodramatic fashion the eventual appearances of the musical's heroes and villians.

This pre-show excitement was even further developed as the mystery's eventual murder suspects lobbied the audience for votes in deciding the eventual murderer and, thus, the ending of the musical.

Written by Rupert Holmes, the musical centers around an 1872 Victorian theater company's performance of Charles Dickens' uncompleted mystery.

The ficticious troupe's ability to stay focused on Dickens' story becomes humorously diverted as they force the plot to comply with their repertoire of songs, dance, and vaudevillian comedy.

"There You Are," the circus-like and electric opening production number, led by William Cartwright, the ficticious company's manager, was explosive in mingling the voices of the performers scattered throughout McCain Auditorium with those on stage.

It is Cartwright, played by Steve LeBlanc, who leads the audience through a series of presentational vignettes that collectively assemble the story of Edwin Drood.

The actual mystery of the musical-within-a-musical centers around Drood, a not-so-likable hero played by Kris Montgomery, who is betrothed to Rosa Bud, the seemingly innocent and pure heroine portrayed by Marie-Laurence Danvers.

The plot thickens when it is discovered that Drood is only one of many suitors interested in capturing Rosa's heart and hand in marriage.

Another interested suitor is John Jasper, played by C.M. Yates, who is Drood's evil uncle and Rosa's music master. He calms his romantic frustration with the assistance of opium provided by the Princess Puffer, played by Karlah Hamilton.

Yet another interested suitor is Neville Landless, played by Bill Lynch, a Middle-Eastern Casanova type who takes an immediate dislike to Edwin.

Mysteriously enough, Drood disappears soon after the audience learns of his rivals, leaving Jasper and Landless as the primary suspects.

The musical becomes interesting in the disclosure of things said or done by seven characters who have potential motives for wanting Drood dead.

In the end, it is the audience who votes by applause the identity of a disguised detective and which characters in the cast shall be united as lovers in the end.

The most exciting aspect of the audience's participation in the performance occurred near the end when the cast split up the audience and tallied the individual sections in order to decide the identity of the murderer.

Music Theatre Group, the New York based company responsible for the production, assembled a top-notch group of performers in the spectacle-filled production.

Most disappointing in the evening's performance was the first act, which, although very entertaining in spots, lacked an energetic pace and seemed to take far too much time to convey the twisted plot.

This was counter-balanced with a quick-moving and exciting second act that was characterized by it's original and exciting moments.

The music, in places, was repetitive and lacked melodic variety.

Most interesting was the historically accurate staging of the play which featured solid and effective portrayal of the company's 1890s false proscenium. This staging was further accentuated by the minimal but effective 1890s set pieces, which were changed with amazing ease.

Hamilton provided the evening's most memorable performance as the charismatic and honestly earthy Princess Puffer. Hamilton was mezmerizing in her two big numbers, "The Wages of Sin," and "The Garden Path to Hell," and caused two well-deserved show stoppers.

Especially notable performances were delivered by Steven LeBlanc, as the company manager, and Michelle Rios, playing the exotic Helena Landless.

Newsome refused to comment on the project until after the hearing.

Manhattan resident Bert Biles doesn't want the high-density complex in the residential zone because he said it would cause parking problems if the units were to be built.

"The students would crowd local residents and visitors out of their parking places," Biles said. "High-density student housing is not a good way to integrate students into campus or community life."

A petition was signed by three of the five adjacent landowners in an attempt to stop the project.

Mark Barnett, administrator for The Saint Mary Hospital, also signed the petition. Barnett said he signed the petition because Newsome's plan did not provide adequate parking for tenants or enough open space for recreation.

"The lack of parking and green space would encourage unauthorized use of our property," he said.

Doug Frihart, director of the College Hill Skilled Nursing Center, is against rezoning the land but was unable to sign the petition because he does not own the land or the nursing home.

"The complex would increase the traffic flow (on Kimball) which makes it hard for ambulances to get in and out," Frihart said.

K-State owns the land on the east side of College Avenue, where KSU Stadium is located. University officials were not asked to sign the petition, Farlin said.

To be considered by the planning board, a legal petition needs 20 percent of the adjacent landowners' signatures. Farlin said that number was attained without K-State's support.

Deb Volesky, office assistant in the Department of Housing, said no housing officials were ever approached with the petition.

A student housing task force formed by the Chamber of Commerce conducted a study last fall to determine if off-campus housing should be increased.

The task force recommended that the housing department renovate Van Zile Hall to increase the housing capacity on campus and work with local developers and property owners to provide more off-campus apartment listings.

The task force further recommended that the planning board ease zoning restrictions so new student housing complexes could be built.

"We feel there is a real need for more student apartments in Manhattan," Donnelly said.

In compiling construction plans of PUDs for 1989, local landlords, realtors and developers were surveyed by the task force. The surveys estimated 377 units with about 747 bedrooms are planned for construction. About 109 units with 236 bedrooms would be for students. Of the 94 surveys mailed, 13 were returned, said Rick Mann, task force chairman.

The board rejected Newsome's first construction plan 5-1 at a public hearing in December, said Eric Cattell, city planner. The city commission did not approve or deny the proposal, but sent it back to the board and Newsome for revision.

The original plan was for a 144-unit complex with one to three bedrooms in each unit. This plan allowed for 374 parking places. Buildings and pavement would cover 64 percent of the lot, leaving 36 percent open space.

The revised 120-unit plan has 61 percent of the lot for buildings and 39 percent open space for recreation. Parking was reduced to 366 spaces.

Espresso Royale employee Carrie Miller, sophomore in biochemistry, explains to a Riley County police officer what happened when Stephen A. Keller, Fort Riley, entered the cafe, caused damage and battered a customer Sunday night. Keller is being held in Riley County Jail.

Fight

"Before he pushed the register off, he tried to break the case, but he couldn't break it. So, he started breaking glasses," Meyer said.

Jim Burnett, owner of the Hibachi Hut and Lone Star Cafe, said he tried to restrain Keller and was helped by Abdellah Laytimi, senior in mechanical engineering.

"I grabbed him and just tried to stop him," Burnett said. "I couldn't believe he hit that guy."

Robert Base, junior in physical education and an employee at Fast Eddys, said Keller and several friends had earlier consumed a "large amount of alcohol" and tried to start a fight at that establishment.

"They were causing trouble and I had to escort them out the door," Base said.

John Kearns of Manhattan said Keller was angry and yelling about a fight when he entered Espresso Royale.

"He said something about these guys beating up his friends and his car so he came in here and trashed the place," Kearns said.

Keller is being held at Riley County Jail. Bond has been set at $1,000.

Embassy's political section in Asuncion.

While Stroessner eventually will have to find a permanent home in another country, no limit was put on how long he might remain in Brazil, Pinto said.

Stroessner came to power as a general in a coup in 1954 and remained commander-in-chief of Paraguay's armed forces until Friday, when Rodriguez led the coup against him. Rodriguez was sworn in as president later that day.

As he left his country for perhaps the last time, the 76-year-old Stroessner wore a blue suit and red tie. He did not acknowledge the crowd and made no final gesture.

slut to housekeeper seem effortless.

Terry Lindeman, junior in preprofessional secondary education, played Clive, the antagonist in the first act, and Gerry, a homosexual in the second. In the first act, Lindeman gives the setting to the show. His character is not accepted but portrayed with chivalry.

As the typical mother-in-law, Penny Cullers was picture perfect. Cullers played Maud, Betty's mother in the first act and Lin, a homosexual mother in the second. In both characters, her performance was outstanding.

By the end of the play, the characters grow and accept themselves and challenge the status quo.

The conventions of "Cloud 9" are different and it isn't the typical production for a conservative campus such as K-State. The play has a message that everyone can relate to, but it is hard to pinpoint the exact audience for the show. The show's tempting combination of psychological and sexual sensationalism proves most appealing to a modern audience and everyone's curiosity.

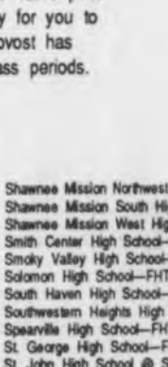
would begin his individual journey to the meeting site.

The companions went to England, Belgium, France, Spain, Italy, Switzerland, Liechtenstein, Austria, East Germany and West Germany. Pashman also went to Holland.

"We tried to get away from some of the more touristy stuff," Patterson said. "We saw a lot of the major sites, but there is so much to see off to the side."

Pashman said they had the most fun in the smaller cities because they could meet the people.

"(In the city, we) just blend in with all the other tourists," he said.



Patterson said he learned about European values from the people he met.

"I know if I ever pass anyone on the highway, and they're cold and have their thumb out, I'll pull over," he said.

Patterson said he thought people gave him rides because they had been a similar situation.

"A lot of people told us, 'Hopefully, someday you can help out someone who is in your position as I have helped you out,'" he said.

The three companions returned to the United States separately on Oct. 30 and Oct. 31.

because it's cold doesn't mean you can park in front of a drive so you don't have to walk as far," he said.

Larry Freeby, patrol sergeant for the Riley County Police Department, said the majority of the calls to the RCPD have also been from residents whose cars wouldn't start. Freeby said he believed there haven't been many cold weather-related accidents because "people are staying in."

The Manhattan school district was closed Friday because the diesel fuel in many of the school buses was affected by the cold temperatures. Superintendent Hal Rowe said he expected classes to be in session today.

Planning board rejects proposal

By Alan Wilds
Staff Writer

A rezoning proposal that would allow a student-oriented apartment complex to be built at the northwest corner of Kimball and College avenues was rejected for a second time Monday night by the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board.

The board denied recommendation on grounds that the land-use plan for that area needs to be updated and more comprehensive before residential building could take place, said Ray Weisenburger board member.

Board member Carol Peak said the fact that the apartments, called Greenbriar, would be the only high-density housing in the area was another factor.

"Putting a high-density development next to a low-density development would cause problems," Peak said.

In an effort to persuade the board to change its December 5-1 vote denial, city planner Eric Cattell presented a revised edition of the complex. The revisions reduced the overall buildings from 12 to 10, changing the total number of units from 144 to 120, with a total occupancy of 300 tenants.

Speaking on the behalf of landowner Jerry Donnelly and his contractor Bo Newsome Construction, Cattell said the apartments would not be strictly for students.

"Couples will be allowed to rent the one-bedroom apartments, which was not mentioned before," Cattell said.

The revision also included an open-field recreation area with a dry detention pond to hold excess rain water.

Cattell said the revisions would make the complex more attractive and should address some of the complaints the planning board had raised in December.

"The total green space has increased from 36 to 39 percent, where at first there was no large green area at all," Cattell said.

After presenting the revisions, Cattell said the City Commission did not reject the original proposal, but wanted the planning board to reconsider after hearing the revisions.

"The need for student housing is here now," Cattell said.

He said the developers have done

Students, faculty divided on tenure

By Deborah Dinges
Collegian Reporter

Although students and faculty agree a valid purpose for tenure exists, they are divided on its effects in a university environment.

"Tenure is a continuous appointment, designed to protect the academic freedom of a faculty member, that can be terminated only in unusual circumstances," according to the Faculty Handbook.

"Tenure must be earned and the burden of proof is on the established record of the individual. Once awarded, the burden of proof for removal of tenure is shifted to the institution," said Thomas Isenhour, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

Tenure gives the faculty member security, said Wayne Norvell, head of the marketing department.

"They don't have to worry about reappointment after they have proven themselves in research and teaching," Norvell said.

Tenure originated during the civil rights movement, Isenhour said. It protected faculty members who participated in demonstrations from being fired.

In 1989, tenure is an academic tradition, he said. A faculty member is tenured within seven years at a university or is released.

Opinions vary concerning how effectively tenure ensures the best possible learning environment for students, said Cheri Casey, senior in life sciences.

"It's good for the teacher, but sometimes, not good for the student," Casey said.

Sometimes ineffective faculty who only have a few years before retirement are allowed to keep teaching because of their tenure status, she said.

Other faculty members are aware of this situation. Casey said she has been advised not to take specific classes because the instructor was getting old and incompetent.

"I can't do anything about it; he has tenure," was the response JoEllen Rupp, sophomore in art,

Lobby Day addresses concerns

By Angie Smith
Collegian Reporter

TOPEKA — More than 100 K-State students spent Monday at the State Capitol with legislators, lobbying for issues concerning the Associated Students of Kansas.

Lobby Day, a joint effort of about 300 students from across Kansas, was organized by ASK to promote concern for ASK issues and to demonstrate students' anti-apathy to legislators.

"It feels great to have taken part in something that may be so beneficial to our University and to our state as a whole," said Tory Poma, a sophomore in hotel and restaurant management who attended Lobby Day.

"I think that 15 students crowded in a small office shows that (students) really do care ... and we are going to vote. Higher education is something we can support," said Jim Gewecke, K-State lobby leader and senior in marketing.

Jill Rathbun, chairperson of K-State's Legislative Affairs Standing Committee and junior in management, said K-State had an outstanding turnout at Lobby Day.

"We put a lot of effort into sending out over 600 letters to legislators explaining K-State views," Rathbun said.

Students from K-State and the 10 other Kansas schools visited different senators and representatives throughout the day discussing support for ASK issues.

The main issues discussed included the continued funding of Margin of Excellence Plan; minority scholarships; the Youth Education Service program, which is designed to help educationally disadvantaged students; and the Kansas Educational Savings Program, which will attempt to help students and families save money for educational expenses.

Sen. Ross Doyan, R-Concordia, spoke on MOE, an issue highly supported by ASK.

"I have no problem supporting the Margin of Excellence as long as you, the students, benefit from the money by getting the qualified professors," Doyan said.

As a K-State alumna, Doyan said she is concerned about instructor adequacy and wants to be sure that funds allocated through MOE are placed where the students can benefit most.

A press conference with the Student Advisory Committee took place at 9:30 a.m. The committee consists of student body presidents from the six regent schools.

Brook Menees, University of Kansas student body president, spoke on incorporating more money for programs such as YES, which seeks to provide financial aid to university students working to help for at-risk students.

Stephanie Haub, senior in business education, laughs at a joke made by Barr. Students presented views to state legislators.

"When college students feel good about helping out students who come from disrupted families get to college, I think we are taking a step to improve Kansas overall," Menees said.

K-State Student Body President Laurian Cuffy said ASK has not yet decided whether Washburn should be accepted as a regents school.

Cuffy said ASK believes it is not yet appropriate to take a side. He said ASK plans to review the submission statement and study the issue.

Gov. Mike Hayden spoke to Lobby Day participants in support of the Washburn issue at a news conference.

"Washburn is the only municipal school left in the United States and I would like to see it become a member of the regents schools," Hayden said.

However, Mike Steinle, K-State graduate student in marketing, said that by Washburn's entering the regents system, alumni support will drop due to its history as a private school and the fear of competition with KU's law school.

Mike Calovich, a member of K-State's Legislative Affairs Standing Committee, was optimistic in that many legislators seemed to support the students' views.

"The senators I talked with were well-informed about the issues brought up and I think that in itself is a good sign," Calovich said.

Proposed bill to lower legal limit for DUI

By Mindy Robert
Collegian Reporter

A new bill which would give Kansas the toughest DUI blood alcohol limit in the country may be introduced to the State Legislature this session.

The proposed bill would lower the legal intoxication limit allowed for persons operating motor vehicles from its current level of .1 to a level of .05.

The only states with a limit lower than .1 are Utah, Idaho and Oregon, which have a .08 intoxication limit, said Rev. Richard Taylor, president of Kansans for Life At Its Best!, the organization that introduced the idea of a .05 limit to the state.

"What the bill would do is encourage drivers to drink less before they drive," he said.

Sgt. K. W. Padgett of the Riley County Police Department said to reach the limit, a 160-pound man would have to drink 2½ 12-ounce beers at the rate of one an hour. At the same rate, a 125-pound woman would reach the limit by drinking 1½ 12-ounce beers.

The bill will be introduced in the House by Rep. Michael O'Neal, R-Hutchinson, and in the Senate by Sen. Ross Doyen, R-Concordia.

O'Neal said a study by the American Medical Association suggested .05 to be the appropriate level for blood alcohol content.

Congress is conducting an additional study to determine a standard limit for blood alcohol content, said Galen Davis, Gov. Mike Hayden's special assistant on drug abuse. The study is part of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act passed by Congress in November, he said.

Congress requested the study so it could determine at what blood alcohol level impairment of the senses is caused, Davis said.

"(Members of Congress say) let's see what the medical officials, law officers and scientists believe should be the appropriate level," he said. They do not want to guess.

But the bill to reduce the alcohol consumption limit to .05 will be introduced in the Kansas Legislature before this study is completed, O'Neal said.

Davis said the study will be beneficial for all states in determining alcohol consumption limits.

Riley County Attorney Bill Kennedy said he is unsure about the future of the bill because it could cause several problems.

"(For the bill) to be effective, we would need to have more police on the road," Kennedy said.

He said the higher arrest rate would pull officers from their patrols to complete the arrest procedures.

"Each DUI arrest takes approximately two hours," Kennedy said.

Padgett also said the arrest procedure takes two hours.

If the number of arrests increased, he said, the department may need to increase manpower at peak times such as Friday and Saturday nights. But he said he is not convinced lowering the limit to the level of .05 would add that much to the workload.

The arrest procedure begins when the driver is pulled over usually for a traffic violation, Padgett said. The officer makes contact with the driver and if alcohol is smelled or seen, the officer will ask the driver to step out of the car.

He said the officer administers several sobriety tests at the scene to determine if the driving ability is impaired. If it is determined that driving ability is impaired, the driver is arrested and taken to the police department.

At the police station, the physical sobriety tests are repeated and the breath test is given if the driver chooses, Padgett said. If the driver chooses to not take the breath test, the state automatically suspends the driver's license for 45 days.

The driver is then booked and bond is set, he said.

Padgett said most people arrested in Riley County for driving under the influence of alcohol have a blood alcohol content ranging from .12 to .13.

"By the time all of this and all the paperwork is done, it is more than two hours," he said.

Kennedy said for each driver arrested by the RCPD four others are stopped and released because they are determined to be below the limit.

Turkish capital to get subway

ANKARA, Turkey — Turkey signed a contract Monday with a Canadian-led consortium for the construction of a subway in the capital.

The consortium, led by the Canadian Urban Transit Development Company, includes the Turkish firm Gama-Guris.

Mayor Mehmet Altinsoy said the first part of the subway system will be built in four years and will be 8.7 miles long. Trains will run between the downtown district of Kizilay and the western suburban areas of Batikent.

The construction will cost $350 million, Altinsoy said.

There will be 12 stations on the line, which is expected to carry about 600,000 commuters daily in this city of 3 million people. Plans eventually call for the subway to extend to 32 miles by 2015, when the city's population is expected to reach 5 million.

Premier Turgut Ozal and visiting Canadian Foreign Trade Minister John C. Crosbie attended the signing ceremony.

Dukakis' wife seeks treatment

BOSTON — Kitty Dukakis, the wife of Gov. Michael S. Dukakis, has entered an alcohol treatment program in Newport, R.I., according to a statement issued by the governor's press office Monday that blamed the letdown after his failed presidential campaign.

Kitty, 52, has had a history of addictions and chemical dependency but was never known to be dependent on alcohol until the statement was released this afternoon.

In July 1987, Kitty announced that she had recovered earlier from a 26-year dependency on diet pills. The governor's wife said she had conquered her addiction to amphetamines, which she hid from her husband.

The governor said his wife entered the Edgehill Newport facility Sunday evening and will stay there for about 30 days.

Doctor gives patients cocaine

NEW YORK — Cocaine may not have been in Marcus Welby's black bag, but it has been the drug of choice for decades at Dr. Milton Reder's practice — a balm for Marvin Mitchelson's headaches, Sonny Bono's sciatica, Whitey Ford's sore shoulder and David Brenner's bad back.

The state says cocaine is not good medicine, and told the physician to stop. He has refused.

"These days cocaine has a bad name. What can I do about that?" asked Reder, who said Monday he has been treating patients with small amounts of cocaine for 40 years. "I say it's the best local anesthetic."

Brenner, the comedian, accused the state Health Department and county medical society of "a witch hunt. ... They can't get Noriega, they can't get the crack dealers a few blocks away, but they're going after an 89-year-old humanitarian."

Reder uses cocaine, legally purchased from pharmaceutical companies, to treat a variety of maladies. A liquid solution, about 13 percent cocaine, is applied with metal swabs inserted through the nostrils against a nerve center at the base of the brain. Reder, his patients, and some doctors say the procedure relieves pain, although no one is sure why.

Reder's treatment was no secret. He has participated in medical studies and been the subject of newspaper and magazine features, which invariably focus on his many celebrated patients.

Mardi Gras includes ride

NEW ORLEANS — In most Cajun towns, masked horsemen celebrate Mardi Gras as they have for hundreds of years, with a riotous ride from farm to farm to scare up some chickens and other ingredients for a huge pot of gumbo.

But in Tee-Mamou, a town of about 400 people deep in Cajun country, the "courir du Mardi Gras" has used trucks since 1919 — the year the horses died.

"They were running pretty hard, it was kind of a long trek," said Larry G. Miller, Tee-Mamou-Iota Mardis Gras Folklife Festival Association's folklife director. "They ended up running across a blue norther that was blowing in right at the end of their run.

"They got to the farmhouse to do their gumbo, and tied the horses up."

When they went out later, about two-thirds of the 28 horses had died from pneumonia brought on by the sudden chill after a long, hot run.

Committee punts tax bill

TOPEKA — A conference committee punted negotiations Monday of a tax relief bill, and debates in the House over reapportionment and a $2.7 billion highway improvement plan continued.

The three senators and three representatives on the tax conference committee remained at loggerheads over how to cut taxes. The Senate has endorsed Gov. Mike Hayden's plan to decrease income taxes $78.9 million. The House approved a plan to cut income taxes $53.1 million and create a $50 million property tax relief fund.

The committee "agreed to disagree" after discussing the differences between the two versions for about a half-hour.

"We have several points of disagreement," said Rep. Keith Roe, R-Mankato, chairman of the House Taxation Committee.

Four of the six lawmakers signed the report to agree to disagree. The only two Democrats — Rep. Joan Wagnon of Topeka, and Sen. Gerald Karr of Emporia did not sign the report.

"Somebody's got to get serious about developing some kind of proposal," Karr said. "This is all that's left."

Family of lawyers punished

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Three members of a Topeka family of lawyers were punished Monday for making false accusations against two federal judges and federal courts in Kansas.

Sanctions were ordered after a hearing Friday in U.S. District Court for Fred W. Phelps Sr.; his daughter, Margie Jean Phelps, and his son, Fred W. Phelps Jr.

The court said Fred Phelps Sr. agreed to voluntarily and permanently relinquish his license to practice law in federal court; Margie Phelps was suspended from practice in federal court for one year beginning March 15; Fred Phelps Jr. was suspended from practice in federal court for six months beginning March 15.

The three lawyers declined comment through a spokesman, saying they could not comment because of directions from the court.

The hearing was conducted by three judges of the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals — Monroe G. McKay, Stephanie K. Seymour and Stephen H. Anderson.

The sanctions arose from a disciplinary complaint filed by the state's federal judges in December 1985 against members of the Phelps family of lawyers. The judges complained that the members of the law firm accused U.S. District Judge Earl E. O'Connor of Kansas City, Kan., of racial and religious prejudice and conspiracy to violate their civil rights.

Landon Lecturer dies in Connecticut

By Kendra Gensemer
Government Editor

Historian and two-time Pulitzer Prize-winning author Barbara Tuchman, who delivered the 80th Landon Lecture Sept. 8, died Monday in Greenwich (Conn.) Hospital.

Tuchman, 77, died of complications following a stroke, said Eleanor Hannon, a hospital spokeswoman. She was admitted to the hospital Saturday.

In an interview last September before delivering the Landon Lecture, Tuchman called herself a "natural storyteller." She said the art of her writing was her main concern.

Sue Zschoche, assistant professor of history, said Tuchman "was really quite wonderful with words."

"What I regretted most about the (Landon) Lecture was that what you missed was how wonderfully she put sentences together," Zschoche said.

Tuchman had some difficulty reading her speech due to poor eyesight and lighting problems.

"She was a fine historian and a charming person," she said.

Although her writing was both lauded and criticized, Tuchman said in the interview that she did not claim to be an "authority on anything," just a professional writer whose subject was history.

Tuchman wrote much of her histories from personal experience. One of her first encounters with history occurred in 1914. Tuchman and her family witnessed an exchange between a British warship and two German naval vessels while sailing to visit her grandfather, then the American Ambassador to Turkey. She included the incident in "The Guns of August," for which she won her first Pulitzer Prize in 1963.

Tuchman received another Pulitzer Prize in 1971 for "Stillwell and the American Experience in China."

Charles Reagan, assistant to the president, said he has long been a fan of Tuchman and spent a day with her when she was here in September.

"I found her a truly charming and remarkable woman," Reagan said.

President Jon Wefald said Tuchman will go down in history as "one of America's finest historians in the 20th century.

"Everybody at K-State will miss Barbara Tuchman. She did an excellent job as Landon Lecturer when she was here last semester," Wefald said. "Everybody was impressed by her sense of history, her scholarship and her sense of humor."

Tuchman's latest book, "The First Salute," which explores the Dutch Revolution and the American Revolution which occurred 200 years later, has been on The New York Times best-seller list for more than nine weeks.

She also wrote "The Proud Tower," a story of Europe before World War I and "A Distant Mirror: The Calamitous 14th Century," a book that traced the tumult of the period by following the career of a feudal lord.

Tuchman said at an October book signing that she had not given any thought to what her next book would be.

"I don't really need a new project now," Tuchman said. "I need a good, long rest, really."

Duck teaches cancer facts to kids

By Carol Knorr
Collegian Reporter

A new faculty member in the Division of Biology is not quite the traditional type of professor. He's a duck.

He answers to the title of Dr. Waddle and in all reality, he may not even be a male.

The committee that designed Dr. Waddle decided not to give him any gender, said Patricia Adams, administrative assistant for the Center for Basic Cancer Research in the Division of Biology.

Dr. Waddle will discuss the topic of cancer to grade school students in a colorbook with text, "A Day with Dr. Waddle: An Introduction to Cancers Written for Our Children." The book and cartoonlike representative were prepared by the Center.

The colorbooks will be ready for distribution to all second- graders in Manhattan by Friday, in an effort to educate students about cancers in a nonthreatening way.

The project began when Betty Rae Wallace, a second-grade teacher at Eugene Field Elementary School, became concerned about cancer education because two of her students were involved with cancer situations at home.

Wallace contacted Lesley Haller, coordinator of the Center, in October and asked if materials on cancer were available for elementary students.

"(Wallace) wanted to help them understand what cancers are," Haller said.

Adams said she was amazed when Haller approached her about the lack of cancer education for grade school children.

"I couldn't believe that second-graders would be concerned about cancers," Adams said.

"(The Center) didn't know what was available, so we did a literature search and found that there was nothing that addressed cancer education in a nonthreatening way," Haller said.

"There were a lot of things for kids with cancer," Adams said. "Everything we found was directed towards the kids who are going into the hospital for chemotherapy or those that had cancer. ... There is really nothing for the kids who are touched by it, but don't have it."

Haller and Adams decided to create a program to educate young children on the subject. They were advised by Dr. George Bascom, local physician, and Terry Johnson, director of the Center and the Division of Biology.

"We talked about (the program) and decided the best thing to do would be to have a character or something the kids could relate to," Haller said.

The group investigated separate ideas on what could be done, then when they met, Dr. Waddle emerged as the best proposal.

The Center tested Dr. Waddle's popularity when a group of second-graders visited the biology department.

"Lesley had some drawings of Dr. Waddle on a clip chart and the kids went crazy over it," Adams said. "They even had questions and kind of understood cancers."

The children wanted to know when Dr. Waddle was going to visit their classroom, Haller said.

"We'd like to consider Dr. Waddle to be kind of a Santa Claus with feathers who loves kids," she said.

Adams said the coloring book begins by introducing Dr. Waddle as a research scientist, then presents background by describing a microscope and some of the diseases scientists study.

The text of the colorbook defines cancer and explains the cell's appearance, growth and effects on a person.

"The last page is a note from Dr. Waddle encouraging kids to go back and read the book again on their own and to ask questions," Adams said.

My name is Dr. Waddle. I do scientific work in a research laboratory.

Even though the first version of the book will be distributed this month, Johnson said they do not consider the book completed.

"What we want to do is get (the coloring book) in the classroom and let the teachers and students give us feedback so we can make another draft," he said.

"All of the Manhattan schools have been very cooperative. In fact, every grade school in Manhattan will be using the book this semester," Johnson said.

He said the first draft is limited to the second grade.

"I think its applicable for more than second-graders," Haller said. "But we didn't know how many copies we would actually have printed or what we could afford to do."

Ag Press printed 1,000 free copies to assist in the project, Johnson said.

"It's really a community project," he said. "School psychologists, superintendents, teachers, principals, Ag Press and our group are all involved. These things have a way of growing."

"As soon as (the second-grade book) is out and about, we have another one to start on for older kids," Haller said.

It will be interesting to see how the teachers use the coloring book in their classroom, Adams said.

When the group started discussing the book with teachers, the Eugene Field School principal asked how long the program would take to teach, she said.

"I assumed he would look at the coloring book and thought they'd be through it within an hour," Adams said. "But Betty Rae said she would take several days to teach it."

Some school principals are considering having school nurses involved with the project, Haller said.

"Really, I think the book speaks for itself," she said. "Once you read it, you understand why we did it. (Dr. Waddle) is such a lovable guy that it has quite an impact. We could never tell you what it does — you just have to read it."

Hazardous lead paint causes many problems

There seems to be a problem of accountability where the State of Kansas is concerned.

The recent discovery that the state-administered Kansas Correctional Industries manufactured paint containing higher than the federally mandated levels of lead only illustrates the point.

Because KCI does not engage in interstate trade, it is not subject to the Consumer Product Safety Commission's federal regulation that established the maximum lead level at .06 percent. Paint produced by KCI and used at K-State was discovered in some cases to contain more than twice that amount.

Apparently, the state did not see fit to establish comparable regulations, much less adhere to the federal ones. KCI did not label the paint cans as containing lead. Ironically, with its high levels of lead, the state requires the paint be disposed of as a hazardous waste. But according to the head of KCI's paint division, labeling the paint "wouldn't mean anything to anyone, anyway."

It did to K-State.

As a result, K-State employees did not wear protective gear when sandblasting, and furniture at the KSU Child Development Center was decorated with the paint, assuming it met the federal standards.

A 1972 pamphlet, produced by the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare, states that ingesting certain amounts of lead-based paint chips can cause brain damage or mental retardation in children.

As well as the probable danger K-State employees were exposed to by inhaling the paint dust — a risk, however minimal, existed at the child development center. Had the discovery not been made, the risk to the children would certainly have increased, particularly whenever the paint would start to chip.

Now, the financially troubled center must replace at least $25,000 worth of recently painted furniture. Also, K-State will have to pay the difference between the old paint and the more expensive replacement paint.

But the financial considerations can't even begin to compare with the danger of the exposure to children and state employees.

It is disturbing to realize that lack of concern — or even the lack of responsibility — on the part of a state which is ideally supposed to protect its citizens, is producing products so costly and dangerous to those very citizens.

Students participate at Lobby Day in Topeka

Students from across Kansas proved Monday they are concerned about the support the Legislature gives to their schools.

Lobby Day, held in Topeka, provided that opportunity. It gave students the chance to spend a day with legislators, lobbying for the Associated Students of Kansas and representing student views and concerns on issues that directly affect Kansas college students. The issues involved state funding, such as the Margin of Excellence Plan, minority scholarships and the proposed affiliation of Washburn with the regents system.

The impact of such an event is great. The increasing involvement in Lobby Day and ASK should indicate to legislators that students are aware of issues and they do care about what is going on in the Capitol — enough so to want to influence lawmakers' decisions.

Not only did more than 100 K-State students battle winter weather conditions to make the trip to Topeka, they traveled during the wee morning hours to be able to lobby their causes.

Lobbying has proven to be an effective tool for getting favored legislation. Thanks to ASK, the organization of Lobby Day and student participation, the students of Kansas were given a chance to tell legislators in Topeka what they wanted — and were heard.

Collegian Editorial Policies

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR are always encouraged. Those which pertain to matters of campus and/or public interest are especially encouraged, and are given the highest priority.

Letters should be kept as brief as possible, preferably under 300 words. Those who cannot condense their opinions should consider submiting their letter in the form of a guest column. All letters are subject to editing for space, style and taste.

GUEST COLUMNS are also encouraged. The column should be no longer than two double-spaced, typed pages. If the submission is used as a column and not a letter to the editor, it will be accompanied by the author's photograph.

Book maligns Kansas State

"Listen up, Kansas students: There is a school where you won't have to endure long-outdated and not particularly amusing Dorothy jokes. Sure, you can choose the other school, but with its urban location and strong academics that have earned it the nickname "the Corn Belt Berkeley," the University of Kansas is an attractive deal."

Commentary

Mark Schmeller
Collegian Columnist

Before you go rushing off to Lawrence, transfer request form in hand, let's take a few minutes to examine the source of that quotation. It comes from the brand spanking new 1989 edition of "The Insider's Guide to the Colleges," compiled and edited by the staff of the Yale Daily News.

The book is billed as unique because its researchers don't pay heed to the propaganda of university administrators and their "hand-picked 'model' students." Instead, they cull their information from real students, many of whom prefer to make their contributions anonymously.

Most of these "contributors" are college newspaper editors or "friends of friends" of Yale Daily News staff members. In other words, you don't get a demographically balanced, scientific survey.

But hey, "The Insider's Guide to Colleges" makes no claim to accuracy. The introduction warns that although they present a "balanced view of the college," it is but a "subjective one." The editors warn readers that they should never eliminate, solely on the basis of this book, a school that genuinely interests them.

Having thus excused themselves from any responsibility for fairness, the editors indulge in the sort of Ivy League snobbery that allows them to classify K-State as "Silo Tech" and indulge in all sorts of hayseed stereotypes.

Comments from the "anonymous contributors" fall into two general categories, the first being subjective and essentially useless impressions like: "Garrison Keillor probably could comfortably have gone to K-State." We are also told that students are "generally apathetic toward national politics" and that "K-State textbooks can easily be pushed aside — if you want to party, you can anytime."

Another contributor speaks of the mystical powers of the ever enigmatic Dr. Wefald: "He's weird ... he draws students."

Another notes that "(Associate Vice President for Institutional Advancement and) Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco ... wears the most purple at any campus event." Apparently this contributor hadn't been around long enough to check out Dr. Hermann "Der Purpurnen Prinz" Donnert.

Although it is easy to dismiss these comments as the vague impressions of a few dingbats, there is a big difference between being subjective and being dead wrong.

Apparently somebody at K-State thinks that "jeans and cowboy boots are the uniform on campus." Students are "conservative" but "profess tolerance" toward the "dissident feminists and liberals" who "keep a low profile." Seems this contributor never laid eyes upon a Collegian editorial page, much less the letters to the editor.

Just how conservative are K-State students?

"When it was heard at K-State that KU handed out condoms in their registration packets this year, people were pretty shocked."

They were? You mean I was the only one who laughed? You mean there wasn't a single KU sorority sister who wrinkled her powdered nose at the words "reservoir tip?" Hard to believe.

With a nickname like "snob hill," KU obviously fares much better with the Yalies. They laud that meeting of minds known as "country club week" and note that "Lawrence is probably the most cosmopolitan town in Kansas."

Whereas K-State has "lax" standards and a "laid-back" academic atmosphere, KU's is described as "serious." The only thing wrong with KU? "The absence of a better performing arts center." Tsk-tsk.

Nonetheless, the "Insider's Guide" review of KU is condescending in its own way. What really seems to overwhelm the editors is that there could actually be an above average school in, of all places, Kansas. After all, "KU is no longer a school just for Kansans." Apparently it's good enough for people from the east and west coasts as well.

And just what does the Yale Daily News think of Yale? Hold on to your cowboy hats, Silo Techers. While "Yale is not perfect, ... few colleges can match its combination of academic challenge and social excitement."

And pray, what are Yale's few teensy-weensy imperfections? We never find out, as the editors are too busy slathering themselves in crass ego gratification. After all, this is the school where lucky students "have the chance to write for the Yale Daily News."

One Yale student is quoted as saying, "Yale has all the benefits of a world-class university while it retains many of the comforts of collegiate life." Another tells us that, "Yale students do everything with a zest."

You may think this sounds like the bombastic blow of model students handpicked by university administrators, but I'm sure that wasn't necessary. As far as I can tell, everyone at Yale is this conceited.

"Yalies are encouraged to go as far and as fast as their gifts will take them," we learn. The editors go to great lengths to outline graduation requirements — which are surprisingly similar to K-State's. And exactly how tough can any school be where George Bush was Phi Beta Kappa?

Furthermore, while "Yalies can choose among a vast array of extracurricular activities, including everything from a children's theater group to a mountaineering club," Yale's most recently famous club, The Skull and Bones Society, and its most famous member, George Bush, are not mentioned.

An exclusive all-male club for blue bloods, The Skull and Bones Society engages in such Ivy League high jinks as nude wrestling and masturbating in coffins.

Nevertheless, we can't expect such perverse acts to grab the attention of the Insider's Guide editors. After all, they're too involved in their own acts of self-love.

Rugby team to begin at K-State

Commentary

Shannon Decker
Guest Columnist

Rugby is a sport unlike any other in excitement, fun and how the game is played. It is a gentleman's sport, or should I say gentlewoman's?

Plans are underway to start a K-State women's rugby football club. Joining an athletic group, such as rugby, has many benefits.

Rugby can provide a tough workout two or three times a week. It is a way to learn a new sport and to travel. Rugby can be played by anyone, and it's a great way to meet new friends.

Rugby is a game (or match) consisting of 15 players on a field (or pitch). The scrum is a group of players much like football's linemen. The backs in rugby are comparable to the backs in football. The object is to move the rugby ball past a scoring line to obtain points, like a touchdown, but called a try.

The players are not allowed to throw the ball forward, but must lateral it or kick it. The players are tackled to stop the ball, yet, although pads are not worn, the game is not as rough as presumed.

K-State had a women's rugby club in 1977-78. The club took second place in the Big Eight Nationals. Following this competitive history, the new club can be just as impressive with its strong leadership and coaching.

I, Shannon Decker, have experience as a rugby captain, player and co-founder of Pittsburg State University's women's rugby club.

Coaching for the K-State women's rugby football club will be provided by experienced players from the very supportive K-State men's rugby football club.

Opposition will come from clubs in Pittsburg, Missouri, Arkansas and Oklahoma. Joining this club will provide an excellent opportunity for friendship and travel in the middle United States.

Anyone can join. The club is open to K-State students, high school students and graduates. A player doesn't have to be a student either.

All athletic abilities are welcome, especially beginners. Most people have never seen or played rugby. The first practices will build on the rules, basics and learning of the game.

The spring season for K-State women's rugby club will consist of two to three practices a week, which will be flexible around schedules.

There will be an organizational meeting at 7 p.m. Monday in Union 213. Everyone is invited to attend. Prospective players, supporters, fans and those just interested in finding out about this sport are encouraged. The sport of rugby, practice scheduling and team organization will be discussed.

Rugby is a fascinating sport. Enjoyment can be found by the players and the fans. The K-State women's rugby football club can be the start of an exciting future for you. Everyone benefits from the workout and meeting new friends.

Remember: Life's a pitch, and then you try.

Editor's note: Shannon Decker is a junior in business.

Fine arts fee

Editor,

Is anyone awake out there? They're at it again.

Who? The almighty KSU Athletic Department! Yes, once again the athletic department is trying to squeeze another $15 out of the student population to stick in its own private coffers. Well, I think I've had about enough.

I have reasons just as good as the athletic deparment's why we shouldn't give it the money. Namely, because we don't have it to give. But besides that, the benefits stink.

First, it says we will be given admission into all non-revenue sports. Well, if we were going to go, we would have already been there and it wouldn't be asking us for money now.

Secondly, it says student season ticket prices would be capped for a three-year period.

Well, that's nice too, but let's look at this a little closer. If it was to raise the football ticket prices, the only people who would show up to watch the games would be the athletic department and the football team. Nobody is stupid enough to raise the ticket price when the attraction is a team that hasn't won a game in two years.

Third, it says the football and basketball season tickets would not be combined for at least three years.

Wow. What a benefit. Maybe the athletic department ought to think about doing it anyway so the people who want to watch sports here will pay to watch, and the rest of us who come here to get an education can pay for that.

Now, on to its goals. If the student fee passed, its first goal would be to fully fund K-State's existing 12 non-revenue sports.

Wake up athletics! Nobody at K-State is fully funded except the men's football and basketball programs, and those can't even be kept under budget. With two fully funded programs and a $680,000 deficit, just imagine what the deficit of 14 fully funded programs would be.

By the way, a few years ago the athletic department led most people to believe it was going to vacate Ahearn Field House when Bramlage Coliseum was built. I guess it was just a nasty rumor. I wonder who started it.

You know, it sure would be nice for someone to pick up my expenses when I go out on tour to perform as a representative of K-State.

Wait. I have a better idea. I'll support the athletic fee if a $15 fine arts fee goes along with it. That way both of us can be happy. The people who want to watch sports can, and the people who want to attend theater and dance performances, art shows, music concerts, or lectures and classes with topnotch guest artists can do that, too.

There. I knew there was a simple solution to this big mess. The athletic department can get its money and we can get the money we so desperately need, too. Isn't everybody happy now?

Sex harrassment

Editor,

The guest column written by Professor Hermann Donnert on his advisee's experience with sexual harrassment was not shocking to me, nor was it surprising. National studies show that this appalling behavior is widespread.

Donnert's experience illustrates the tremendous problem we have to face: the attitude that coercing a woman into having sex is not rape and that the attempt is not sexual assault.

That attitude is held by the GTA who tried to force his student into having sex, and it is shown by an administrative policy that is written to be unenforceable. The ridiculous requirement that there be witnesses to an assault allows the administration to treat lightly any complaint.

Good for you, Donnert, for bringing this issue out into the open. Your student suffered an experience as traumatic as any assault in a dark alley, and I hope she is recovering. It is time that we recognize that this behavior doesn't only occur in dark alleys.

Policy flawed

Editor,

I, along with everyone else at K-State, am upset with the quality of our library and especially with the number of volumes that are missing.

After three years of accepting our problem, I found part of the problem. There exists a huge loophole in Farrell's check-out policy.

Faculty and staff don't have to return their borrowed books. Ever.

Each year the library sends out an enormous list of volumes owed by faculty and staff. Rather than return them, replace them, or even prove their existence, the faculty and staff re-check-out the entire list. The books and magazines are out of the students' reach for another year.

This policy needs to be stopped. Acknowledged faculty and staff have rights to the library also, but they should be compelled to return or replace volumes within a reasonable period of time. Books required all year for several years should be purchased, not held out of students' hands.

Prominent lecturers

Editor,

Thank you very much for your editorial supporting the Lou Douglas Lecture Series. We have an exciting season coming up starting with Nomonde Ngubo, a representative of South African' black trade unions.

Ngubo will be speaking at 7:30 p.m. Feb. 14 in Forum Hall. She will be followed by John Swomley on Feb. 28, Jonathan Kozol on April 6, and Ibraihim Abu-Lughod on April 18.

We hope the student body will take your advice and come to all four lectures. They will be the "prominent and respectable," individuals you describe in your editorial as Landon speakers, but they certainly won't be defending the status quo.

Fitness program designed for ease

By Angie Smith
Collegian Reporter

Being too busy may not be an excuse for lack of exercise. For people attempting to find time for fitness, programs at Ahearn Field House can accomodate individuals' full schedules.

People can work out, shower, eat lunch and be back to work in one hour. Students need only to walk as far as they would walk to class to have access to such options as a weight room, a three-court gymnasium and an indoor track.

Ahearn's fitness program is designed to offer the conveniences of time, space, and money in a way in which the reward is fitness, said Taralyn Boller, director of the program.

"It's an inexpensive opportunity to be involved with an exercise program," Boller said.

The program includes non-structured and structured activities, fitness testing and other opportunities.

Staff/Brett Hacker

Nancy Hedrick, K-State graduate, stretches during an aerobics class in the remodeled Ahearn Field House Monday night. The beginning and intermediate level class is offered at 7 p.m. Monday and Wednesday.

The facilities available for non-structured activity include a weight room equipped with exercise bikes and Nautilus, universal, and free weight equipment; a newly surfaced indoor track; and a three-court gymnasium for basketball, badminton, and volleyball, Boller said.

These facilities are available from 6 to 7:30 a.m., 11:30 a.m. to 1 p.m., and 6 to 9:30 p.m. Monday through Friday.

The structured activities include three aerobics classes. A progressive cardiovascular class is offered at 11:30 a.m. Monday, Wednesday and Friday; an aerobic workout which combines the best of aerobic dance, calisthenics, and jogging is scheduled at noon Tuesday and Thursday; and an aerobics class for beginning and intermediate level participants is offered at 7 p.m. Monday and Wednesday.

Other structured events are hydrorobics, a water exercise class geared for all ages, at 7:30 a.m. Monday through Friday, and a flex and tone class consisting of non-aerobic exercises designed to firm, tone and strengthen all major muscle groups at noon Monday, Wednesday, and Friday and at 11:30 a.m. Tuesday and Thursday.

A non-structured pass for one semester costs $7.50 per individual, $11 for a husband and wife, and $18 for a family. The cost of a structured pass, including the classes and access to the facilities, is $12 for an individual and $18 for a husband and wife.

"We are not competing with other fitness centers but providing the opportunity to K-State faculty and staff members and their spouses," Boller said.

Although the program is aimed at faculty and staff, students and the general public are may use the facilities for non-structured events, but may participate only in the those structured events scheduled in the evening.

Ed Olson, associate professor of economics, uses the facilities three days a week and said he likes the conveniences of Ahearn.

"I hope these facilities will always be available. I've used them for 18 years. If I had to go out to (the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex), I don't think I'd have time to exercise," Olson said.

Stella Colan, graduate student in health and physical education, takes advantage of the noon aerobics session.

"It's really convenient because it is right here on campus and fits into my schedule," Colan said.

Boller said about 400 non-structured and 200 structured passes have been sold this semester to faculty and staff members.

Four hundred non-structured passes have been sold to students. Boller said the low rate of student participation is due to unfamiliarity with the program.

"This is the first year we started marketing the exercise programs, and I don't think students are aware of this inexpensive opportunity," Boller said.

The fitness testing includes calculating the percentage of body fat, exercise prescription consulting and weight control counseling, Boller said.

Free blood pressure checks are given the first Tuesday and Wednesday of each month, and once a semester a complete blood serum analysis is available.

From 6 to 8 a.m. Wednesday and Thursday, the blood serum analysis will be given. The test, administered by a medical technician from Memorial Hospital, will measure levels of cholesterol, triglycerides, glucose and calcium.

As of Sunday, 25 people had registered to have the complete analysis. The participants need to fast 10 to 12 hours prior to the test. Results will be available at the Physical Education and Leisure Studies Office.

Legislators to vote on salary increase in today's session

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Four Kansas congressman joined in a bipartisan effort in the House on Monday to help force a vote on a proposed 51 percent pay raise for lawmakers and top federal officials.

House Speaker Jim Wright agreed to schedule a vote on the pay raise after rebellious lawmakers rejected 238-88 a leadership motion to adjourn.

Rep. Bob Whittaker, an Augusta Republican, did not vote on the adjournment motion because he was in Kansas, said Kelly Presta, the congressman's press secretary.

Pay raise opponents sought to bring the salary proposal to an immediate vote on Monday but Democratic leaders tried to head it off with a procedural move to adjourn the House. When that failed, Wright agreed to schedule a vote on today on whether the pay raise should be rejected.

The pay increase, part of a package of raises for federal judges and top executive branch officials, will take effect automatically on Wednesday unless rejected by both the House and Senate.

All five Kansans in the House have said they oppose the proposed pay increase, which would raise salaries to $135,000 from $89,500, and would vote against it if given the opportunity.

The Senate voted 95-5 last week to reject the pay raise for Congress and top executive officials. Before Monday's revolt on the House floor, Wright had planned to let the whole package take effect without a vote and then schedule a vote Thursday on a measure that would cut the congressional raise to 30 percent and ban members from accepting speaking fees.

But that all changed with the adjournment motion. Wright's promise of a vote today brought widespread predictions that the pay raise proposal would be killed.

Voting against the leadership motion to adjourn were Reps. Pat Roberts, a Dodge City Republican; Jim Slattery, a Topeka Democrat; Jan Meyers, an Overland Park Republican; and Dan Glickman, a Wichita Democrat.

Bush announces plan to bailout savings industry

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Despite some reservations, securities analysts generally applauded President Bush's announcement Monday of a savings and loan industry bailout plan that includes higher federal insurance premiums for banks as well as thrifts.

"It's something the whole system can live with," James Wilson, an analyst with Sutro & Co. in San Francisco, said of the deposit insurance premium hike, a key part of Bush's proposal.

Under Bush's plan, the higher premiums would be used to help pay the interest on $50 billion in bonds to finance the bailout of insolvent thrifts.

"It's a big dollar figure, but it's an enormous industry — the effect on individual depositors or homebuyers isn't going to be enough for them to notice signficantly," Wilson said.

Allan Bortel, an analyst with Shearson Lehman Hutton Inc. in San Francisco, said "the premiums that are being increased are very small — it doesn't raise much more money each year from savings instiutions.

"It doesn't seem to be onerous for the S&Ls."

But James Marks, of SNL Securities in Hoboken, N.J., said the proposed increase could force some shaky thrifts over the edge.

"They can't afford to pay as much as they are now," Marks said.

Gymnastics Club exhibits skills in Union

By The Collegian Staff

The Union was jumping Monday as the Gymnastics Club performed various tumbling exercises in the Union Courtyard.

Beginning with basic skills such as cartwheels, forward rolls and roundoffs, the skill levels increased by adding variations such as jumps and flips, said David Lien, founder and adviser for the club and assistant professor in physics.

The purpose of the exhibition was to create an awareness among students about gymnastics and to generate interest in the club, said Sam Ory, sophomore in political science and pre-law and Gymnastic Club president.

The main purpose of the club is recreation and providing an opportunity for interested students to experience gymnastics, Lien said.

The club is open to all people with varied experience levels, from beginners to students who have competed on the college level, he said.

"We'll take anyone and teach them," Ory said.

Some club members attended their first competition by participating in the Rocky Mountain Open last semester in Colorado Springs, Colo. The group didn't receive any medals, but Lien said it was important they went.

The club was started in the fall of 1987, and its members hope to have more exhibitions and to sponsor a gymnastic clinic this semester, Ory said.

"It's fun — that's why I started it," Lien said. "We have a good time, keep in shape and make friends. That's why we do it."

Arizona claims top spot

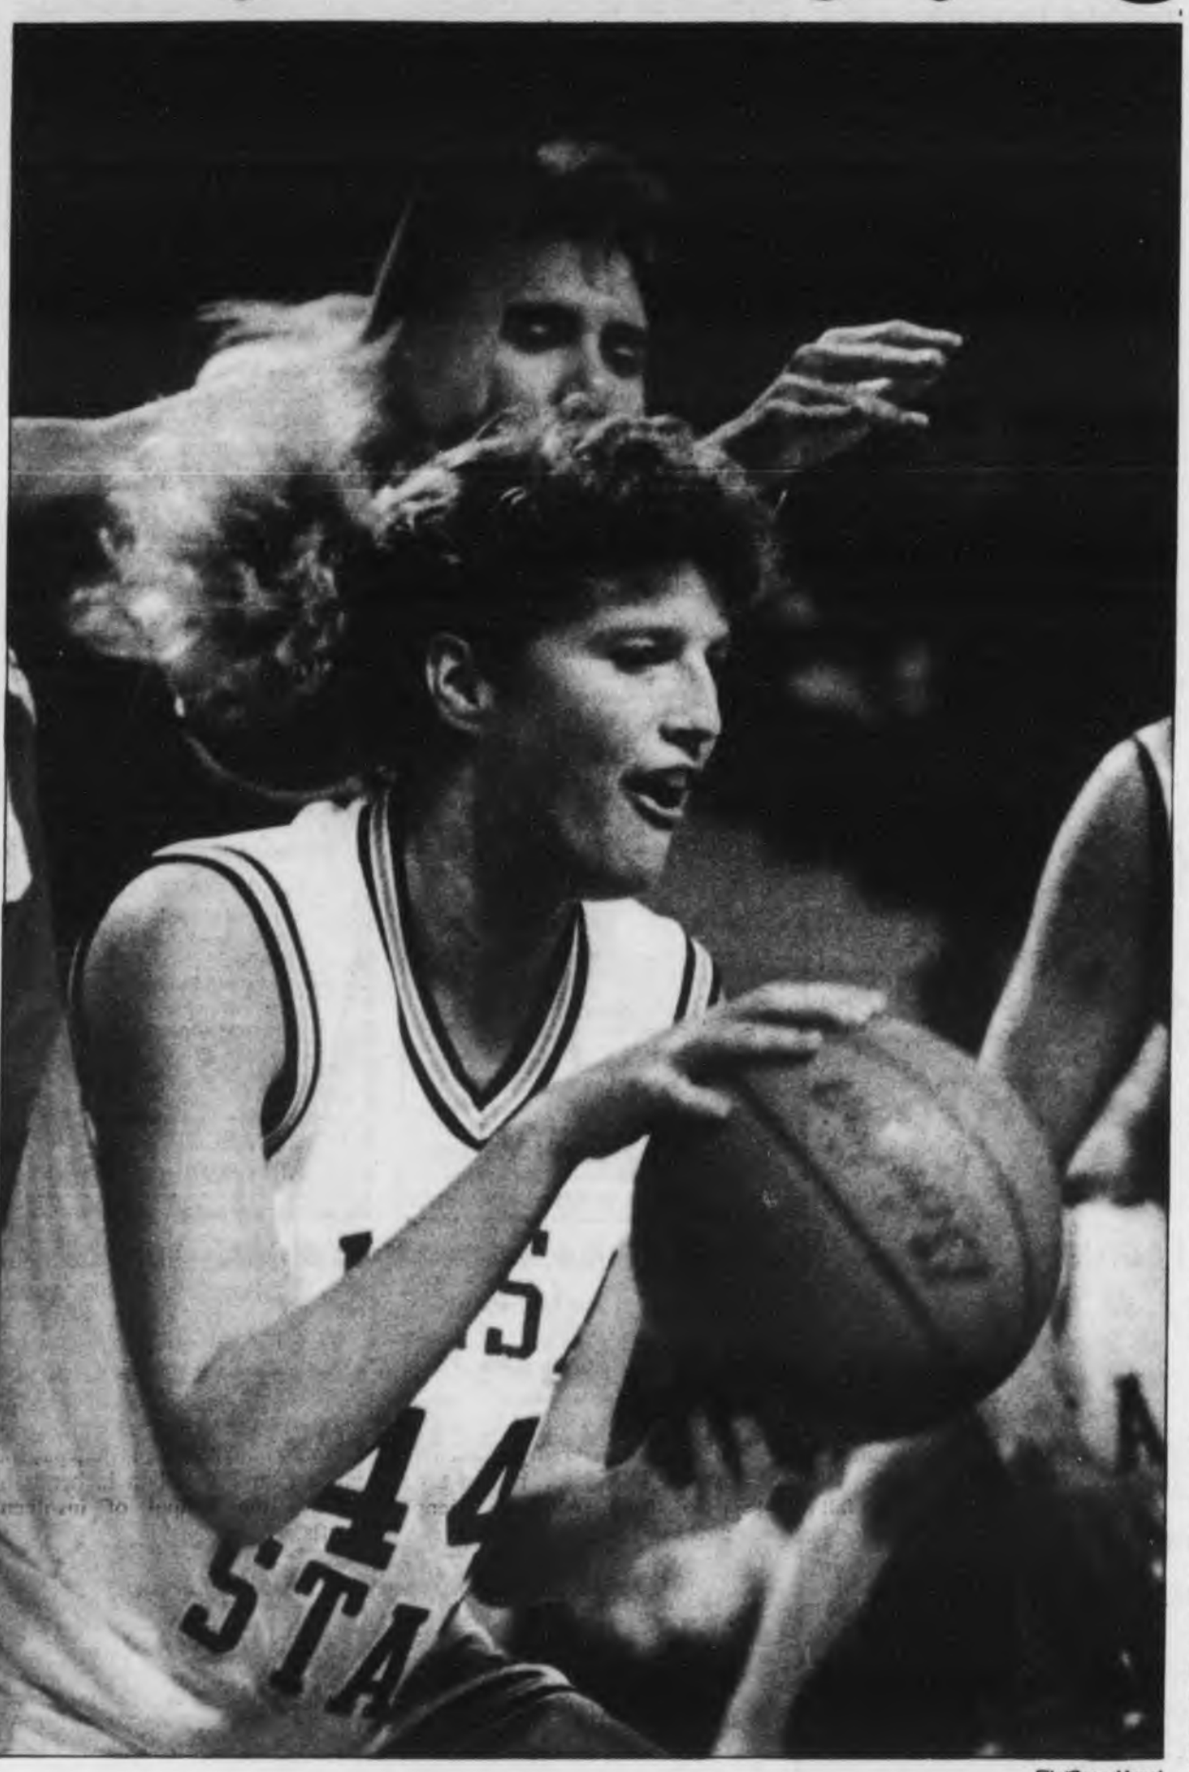
By The Associated Press

For the fourth consecutive week a new team claimed the No. 1 spot in The Associated Press college basketball poll. Arizona went to the top of the rankings on Monday, a position the Wildcats held for six weeks last season.

Arizona, 17-2, received 30 of the 65 first-place votes cast by the nationwide panel of sportswriters and broadcasters and 1,226 points to reclaim the No. 1 ranking it held for six weeks in a seven-week period in the middle of last season.

Georgetown, 17-2, jumped from sixth to second with 1,180 points, 11 more than Missouri, 20-3, which moved up from fifth. Georgetown, which was second in three polls this season, received 17 first-place votes, while the Tigers, whose No. 3 ranking is their highest of the season, were named on the top of 12 ballots.

Louisville, 16-3, was fourth with three first-place votes and 1,090 points, just 14 more than Oklahoma, 18-3, which dropped from the No. 1 spot but still received two first-place votes.



North Carolina, 18-4, dropped from third to sixth after losing to Clemson in its only game last week. The Tar Heels were the only other team to receive a first-place vote as their 911 points included one vote as No. 1.

Illinois, last week's No. 2 team, Iowa, Syracuse and Michigan round out the Top Ten.

Michigan, 17-4, and Seton Hall, 19-3, switched places from last week's poll as the Wolverines had 726 points and the Pirates 658.

Following Seton Hall in the Second Ten were Florida State, Indiana, Duke, West Virginia, Ohio State, North Carolina State, Stanford, Nevada-Las Vegas and Georgia Tech.

Lady Cats enjoying turnaround

File/Greg Vogel

K-State forward Kristie Bahner has been instrumental in the Lady Cats' success this season. The Lady Cats are 16-5 and in second place in the Big Eight Conference after finishing in last and 8-20 a year ago.

Year of maturity provides remedy

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

Last year at this time, the K-State women's basketball team had only one Big Eight Conference victory and eight overall, a number that would end up the final figure in the Lady Cats' victory column.

No other Lady Cats' team had ever won less than 10 or, for that matter, even had a losing season, but last year coach Matilda Mossman's youngsters earned the distinction of having the worst record ever (8-20) for a K-State women's squad.

But, oh, what a difference a little maturity can do for a basketball team. With six games remaining, the Lady Cats have already doubled last year's victory total at 16-5 and have sole possession of second place in the conference at 6-2, two games behind first-place Colorado.

"No. 1, I think a year of experience and maturity have made a big difference," Mossman said.

A big difference, indeed. Last year, the Lady Cats ended the season starting three freshmen and two sophomores without a senior on the roster. With a year of maturing, those three freshmen have made a big impact as sophomores.

All three are averaging in double figures with guard Nadira Hazim leading the charge at 14.1 points a game. Forward Diana Miller follows her, hitting at a 12.1 clip, while the sophomore who has probably had the biggest impact as of late, Kristie Bahner, is averaging 11.7 points.

Bahner has come on strong, especially since the Lady Cats started Big Eight play, averaging 15.3 points in conference games and has been in double figures in six of the eight league contests.

"Of those three I think you have to look mainly at the change of Kristie Bahner," Mossman said. "When she first came here, she couldn't even run drills. But now she has a lot more confidence and she has been our biggest improvement as far as returning people are concerned."

With that comes Mossman's second explanation for the Lady Cats' 180-degree turn this season. It has come in the form of 5-foot-5 point guard Mary Jo Miller, the freshman sensation from Milroy, Minn.

"Mary Jo Miller has made a significant difference in (helping) us establish ourselves offensively this year," Mossman said.

Miller is the Lady Cats' fourth starter who is averaging double figures, tallying 10.1 points a game while dishing out an average of five assists. Miller was also instrumental in a game Mossman says may have been the key to this whole season being a success.

Way back during Thanksgiving break, in just their second game, the Lady Cats found themselves looking dead into a mirror reflecting last year. They were down by 20 points to Montana with six minutes remaining.

But Mary Jo Miller was also in that reflection. Not being one who was used to losing, Miller sparked a furious come-back that will go down as arguably the best that will ever again take place at Bramlage Coliseum.

That one-point victory over Montana might go down as the game that turned the Lady Cats' fortunes around. With six minutes to go in just the second game, instead of throwing in the towel on the entire season, that come-from-behind win has probably been the fuel to one of the most remarkable turnarounds basketball fans will ever see.

Also instrumental this season has been the solid play of the Lady Cats' fifth starter, center Rita Matteucci, and the way the K-State reserves have excepted their roles and know what is expected of them.

"Rita is probably what stabilizes us. She plays intelligent, scores double figures, gets the rebounds ... she's just playing consistent for us," Mossman said. "I think you can also look past our five starters this year. The people on the bench have stepped up into their roles a little better."

And, although Mossman and the Lady Cats are enjoying such a successful season, the fifth-year coach still says her squad has a job to do.

"We can't get excited about being 16-5," Mossman said.

Warriors' Richmond proving he's cream of NBA rookie crop

It's Just Madness

CHRIS HAYS
Sports Editor

Mitch Richmond has once again silenced his critics — that is, if he has any left. Most who were skeptical of Richmond taking his talents any further than K-State and the Big Eight Conference are now genuine believers in the shy, boyish kid from Fort Lauderdale, Fla.

If you haven't heard by now — and you have unless you just crawled out from under a rock — Richmond, a former K-State standout who is now starring for the NBA's Golden State Warriors, is the leading candidate for the league's rookie of the year honor.

If people said this in a conversation back in November, they would have drawn several chuckles and then been bombarded with numerous names who others may have felt had a lot better chance at gaining rookie of the year than did Richmond.

A skeptic's point of view might have been, "There's no way Richmond could be rookie of the year in the same rookie class as Danny Manning."

Think again, pal. Manning couldn't even take the daily stress of the rugged NBA, suffering a season-ending knee injury earlier this year. He will now have to watch the Los Angeles Clippers suffer through another horrid season — a season in which Manning was supposed to be so instrumental in helping the Clippers turn everything around.

Counting Manning, four of the NBA's seven rookies who were also on the U.S. Olympic team with Richmond have suffered from injuries or illnesses due to the constant pressure of everyday life in the NBA.

But Richmond has shown no signs of wearing down and has even garnered a nickname from Golden State teammate Chris Mullin that is pretty much indicative of Richmond's stamina. Mullin has dubbed Richmond "the Rock."

"I like to call him 'the Rock,' as in rock solid. He's a hard body," Mullin said in the Monday's edition of Sports Illustrated.

The only real criticism Richmond has received in his first NBA season comes from his three turnovers per game average. But even that figure is

Statistics system helpful to coaches

Final III nearly ready to become official

By Brett Stranathan
Contributing Writer

Bramlage Coliseum was a Christmas present for the KSU Athletic Department, and inside the package was a new basketball statistics system, Final III.

Bob Swenson, owner of Manhattan Data Systems, Inc., donated the $18,000 computer system that records team and individual statistics for both men's and women's basketball teams.

Final III was originally created for the University of Louisville. Only 15 schools in the country have this particular computerized system and four are Big Eight Conference schools — Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma and K-State. The system allows teams to exchange information simply by using a computer disk.

Manhattan Data Systems runs Final III for KSU Sports Information. According to the company's staff, the system consists of three National Cash Register personal computers. A personal computer with a hard disk drive controls two PCs that do not communicate with each other.

"This gives us enough memory to create the equivalent of a floppy disk inside the computer's memory. The computer can then store and process information at the same time," said Alice Edwards, system analyst for Manhattan Data Systems.

Statistics are kept throughout the game by operators using light pens on Taxan computer monitors. The team rosters are displayed on the first monitor screen, along with data such as the type of shots taken, whether they were missed or made, and statistics on fouls, rebounds, steals and assists.

"It is more sophisticated than a stats sheet and it gives a better breakdown of your opponent."
—Lon Kruger men's basketball coach

The second monitor, which is used to record the location of a shot, displays a half-court area. A programmer uses a keyboard to correct any light pen operator errors and to control the system's clock, which runs two seconds behind the game clock to allow for human delay.

Another keyboard controls the display of the media monitors that are used by television and radio broadcast crews.

Two people are used as spotters, one for each team. As the action occurs, the team's spotter will call out the player's number and the event, which the first light pen operator records. The event then appears at the top of the second monitor's screen, whose operator records the location of the event.

A printer records the event on paper along with the event's number, then the media monitors instantly receive the new player statistics.

Final III can deliver considerable amounts of different information. A halftime and final box score are printed as well as the respective play-by-plays. The system can print a shot chart, turn-over analysis, shots by area and distance, offensive and defensive effectiveness, effort analysis by groups of players, and season and career statistics. It can also give scouting reports and complete player profiles.

According to KSU Sports Information, the system requires five or six people to operate, as opposed to eight for a manual statistics crew. But the manual crew will still be used while the bugs are being worked out of the computer system.

Next year, a smaller manual crew will be used as a back-up in the case of the system's failure.

Discrepancies between the data generated by the manual crew and the Final III crew sometimes exist, said Mike Thomason of Manhattan Data Systems.

"It depends on the spotters' opinions on who got the assist or the steal," he said. "There are always going to be differences."

Even though it is new, Final III is already a big hit at Bramlage. According to sports information, it is faster and more accurate in recording the 450- to 600-plus events that occur in a game.

"It's a big help," said Lady Cats head coach Matilda Mossman. "The coaches pack really helps out alot. It gives us what player combinations work best on defense and offense."

The coaches previously would have had to figure out this information by sifting through game data.

Wildcat head coach Lon Kruger agreed.

"It is more sophisticated than a stats sheet and it gives a better breakdown of your opponent," Kruger said.

Sports Briefly

Wildcat pentathlete takes first

K-State's Terry VanLaningham placed first with 3,638 points in the Wildcat Pentathalon Monday at Ahearn Field House.

VanLaningham had marks of 8.5 seconds in the 60-meter hurdles, 21-10¼ in the long jump, 37-6 in the shot put, 6-8 in the high jump and 2:56.7 minutes in the 800 meters.

Placing third for K-State in the men's division was Richard Croll, who had 2,991 points. In the women's division, K-State had just one competitor, Karen McGaughey, who took third with 3,274 points.

Tartabull signs for $1 million

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Kansas City rightfielder Danny Tartabull agreed to a one-year contract with the Royals Monday, accepting a $1 million deal and avoiding arbitration.

Tartabull received a $705,000 raise to $1,035,000. He was scheduled to go to arbitration Friday with a request for $1,070,000. The Royals had countered with an offer of $900,000.

Without rights to arbitration last year, Tartabull engaged in a bitter feud with Royals management when Kansas City renewed his contract. He held out of training camp before finally reporting.

Incentives in Tartabull's new contract include $100,000 for being named most valuable player, $25,000 if he is a starter on the All-Star team, $15,000 for being an All-Star reserve, $25,000 for being named Silver Slugger and $25,000 for winning a Gold Glove.

The Royals also announced the signing of catcher Mike Macfarlane to a one-year contract. Macfarlane won the Royals catching job in spring training, but was abruptly demoted to Class AAA Omaha on July 23. He was batting .265 with four home runs and 26 RBI.

Team to review school

Officials hope to regain accreditation

By Gary Lytle
Collegian Reporter

The A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications is well on its way to regaining the academic accreditation it lost in 1986, said Carol Oukrop, director of the school.

Underfunding of the school was the main reason for accreditation denial, Oukrop said. The accreditation teams which visited the school in 1975-76 and 1979-80 reported the school's level of funding to be a major problem.

By 1986, when the school's accreditation was reviewed again, operating costs had risen, the number of students had increased by about 200, and the operating budget had been cut from $22,000 to $18,700, she said.

Another problem area cited by the accreditation team was journalism students being allowed to apply more than the maximum 30 credit hours of journalism courses toward their degree requirement of 120 credit hours, she said.

Because of the problems, the Accrediting Council on Education in Journalism and Mass Communication denied the school its accreditation beginning in the spring of 1987.

"(It) just made us mad to have what we knew was a quality operation be denied accreditation," Oukrop said.

David Adams, director of Student Publications Inc., said although there were deficiencies in the program, "I don't think we were a poor program before the loss of accreditation."

Oukrop said, "The best thing (the loss of accreditation) meant to the department is that ... it brought to the attention of the K-State administration that we had long been grossly underfunded."

Since the loss of accreditation, there has been an 80 percent increase in the general operating budget for the school, she said.

Losing accreditation has also brought the problem of funding to the attention of journalism alumni, Oukrop said. The major donation by Carl Miller, former executive editor of the Pacific Coast edition of The Wall Street Journal, was a direct result of the attention focused on the school by the loss of accreditation.

"As far as (the loss of accreditation) hurting employment of our students, you'll never convince me that it did," she said.

The formal process to regain the accreditation will begin in the fall semester when a three- to five-member site review team will visit the school, Oukrop said.

The team will interview President Jon Wefald and Thomas Isenhour, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, and journalism faculty members, she said.

At least one general session with journalism students will be scheduled in addition to sessions with journalism students from each degree sequence, Oukrop said. The team will also visit a large number of journalism classes, Farrell Library and the journalism school library.

By March 1990 the site review team should have completed its report and forwarded it to the accrediting council, she said. The final decision on restoring accreditation to the school would be made by early May.

Films teach high school athletes drug awareness

By Lance E. Schwulst
Collegian Reporter

Maurice Benson and Tom Thaemert, seniors at Manhattan High School, watched "Down Fall: Sports and Drugs" and saw how the lives of athletes can be ruined by drugs and alcohol. Immediately, they recognized traits of several of their peers.

"It kind of really hit home," Benson said. "I watched the film and thought 'Gee, I know people like that.'"

Benson and Thaemert watched the film with their basketball teammates and MHS coach Terry Taylor during a pre-practice session.

The film about drug and alcohol awareness is one of 10 that are free to every unified school district in the United States. The videos are produced by independent film companies and paid for by the U.S. Department of Education.

"(The athletes in the film) started getting really cocky and started not to care about how they did," Benson said.

"It ruined their whole life," Thaemert said.

Judy Cherrington, spokeswoman for the drug abuse office in the Department of Education, said video companies submitted proposals for the bid to produce the videos.

"Some of the videos utilized stars the students can identify with," Cherrington said.

Lou Gossett Jr. and Kirk Cameron are two of the celebrities who deliver their message in the 30- to 40-minute videos.

"Our kids here took the films positively. They realized you can't be on drugs and be an athlete," Taylor said. "As they become available, I hope I can use more of the tapes."

Two of eight tapes have been received, said Mary Beth Reese, alcohol abuse prevention coordinator for Manhattan schools.

"The tapes are being distributed by the production companies, so they are trickling into the schools one by one," Cherrington said.

"The videos will primarily be used by teachers in the classroom setting or by social workers," Reese said.

The focus of the films is lifestyle change and awareness of decisions, as well as the consequences of abusing drugs and alcohol, she said.

"One film shows a girl who uses cocaine and ends up in a coma. It shows the choice she made and what happened to her," Reese said.

She said the films are just a part of the drug and alcohol awareness program Manhattan public schools have had since 1980.

"We are one of the few schools that has had an alcohol abuse prevention program for as long as we have," Reese said.

Manhattan schools employ a part-time person for elementary drug and alcohol education, she said. There are also numerous groups including Students Against Drunk Driving and parent education programs.

University awarded $3 million grant

From Staff and Wire Reports

K-State has been awarded a three-year, $3 million federal grant to establish a research consortium studying hazardous wastes and pesticide problems, said Donald Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering.

The grant, awarded by the Environmental Protection Agency, is likely to be extended two years after the EPA evaluates the consortium's research, bringing the grant total to $5 million, Rathbone said.

As the lead university for the consortium, K-State will be provided with almost $640,000 the first three years, which will be matched by the other participating schools: the University of Iowa, the University of Missouri, the University of Montana, Montana State University, the University of Nebraska and the University of Utah.

Larry Erickson, professor of chemical engineering and director of the Office of Hazardous Waste Research, said the grant will allow the University to become recognized as a national authority on hazardous wastes.

"I think what we will be doing is important, because society is concerned about hazardous wastes," Erickson said. "We're especially concerned about the management and disposal of the wastes, and how to minimize waste problems."

The grant money will buy research equipment and establish a technology transfer program that will allow communication between the supporting consortium schools, he said.

The four major areas to be studied by the consortium are metals and mining wastes, wood preservatives, pesticides and hazardous substances associated with industrial activities, Erickson said.

Rathbone said the grant would give K-State "prestige" in the area of hazardous waste management.

"This will do a couple of things, other than allowing the University to explore this area," he said. "Once we have the center here and research started, we'll be recognized as experts in this field."

Robin Woods, an EPA spokeswoman, said the grant was part of $25 million in research monies to be awarded during five years through the Superfund program to five research centers across the country. An annual $1 million grant will go to each of the lead universities of the centers, and those institutions will be responsible for splitting up the monies to participating schools.

"I think what we will be doing is important, because society is concerned about hazardous wastes."
—Larry Erickson professor

Rathbone said Erickson was instrumental in obtaining the grant.

K-State established the Office of Hazardous Waste Research in 1985 with funds appropriated by the State of Kansas. The office's goals are to train students in the area of hazardous waste research, provide a focal point for research and communication, and develop a professional staff which can conduct contract and grant research for industry and government.

Tenure

received when she complained about a faculty member.

If a series of legitimate complaints against a faculty member are made, "get rid of him," Norvell said.

If the faculty member has tenure, "there's not much I can do about it, but prove he is incompetent, which is quite a hastle.

"The key is to make sure the people you're tenuring excel in teaching, research and are student-orientated," Norvell said.

About 700 faculty members at K-State have tenure status. Faculty members on a tenure track are estimated at 300, said Mary Rakowsky, secretary for Faculty Senate.

Students' opinions are directly related to the character of the people K-State tenures, said Provost James Coffman.

"If we tenure someone who loses interest or is not on the edge of their discipline, the student is a loser," Coffman said.

It does happen that tenured faculty members don't stay abreast in their field, he said. Sometimes they are not as enthusiastic about their field of research as they were at the time they received tenure.

"If this is approached in a negative way, you will get a negative response," said Mark Lapping, dean of the College of Architecture and Design.

In this situation, "to promote or not," is the ultimate question for Lapping. He said he uses the merit pay structure to send a message to faculty who are becoming apathetic.

In the College of Architecture and Design, the department head reviews faculty members every year for their contributions to teaching, research, the University and in areas of service. Lapping uses these evaluations to make recommendations of promotion and salary raises, he said.

The administration takes annual evaluations and salary adjustments seriously, Coffman said. Salaries were raised anywhere from zero to as much 40 percent last year.

Beyond this continual reassessment of the individual's ability, "We can design a mix of assignments to make the best use of the people we have," Coffman said.

Not only are student evaluations important in salary adjustments, they play an integral part of the tenure decision, Norvell said.

"Most students are only interested in how good the teacher is in class and how much they can learn from him," he said.

"The reason we have universities is for students," Norvell said. "If you lose your student ratings, you're dead."

Isenhour views student evaluations differently.

"Students who take the course are not the best judge of quality teaching," he said. Isenhour is of the opinion student evaluations are important, but taken by themselves, they are inaccurate.

It is difficult sometimes because students and faculty members fail in the sense that popularity loses out to quality, Lapping said. That's why it's important for faculty to be acquainted with each other's teaching methods and philosophies.

Another problem concerning tenure is that requirements vary across campus and across many universities, Norvell said.

"An instructor may be tenurable at K-State, but not at MIT," he said.

The consideration of tenure has to be put in the context of the discipline, Isenhour said.

In art, the criteria is different. The faculty member is evaluated on the development of art, performance and other variables, he said.

"This is a big, complicated, diverse place and the tenure review process has to recognize the very complex set of missions at K-State," Lapping said.

When faculty members prepare for a tenure review, they have to have their "ducks" in order, Lapping said. It's not enough to say they were good teachers.

Accepting tenure means making a career-long, if not life-long commitment.

"We must make sure he or she is not only above average in scholarship and effectiveness as a teacher, but they are what K-State needs in a university," Coffman said.

The tenure review process begins with the department head who submits a recommendation to the college dean. Before the recommendation is made, the tenured faculty in the department vote on the candidate, Isenhour said.

A good test for the faculty is to ask themselves if they are enthusiastic about having this individual as a colleague for the rest of their career, he said.

The recommendations are forwarded to the college dean and are submitted to the dean's council. Final recommendations are made by the provost to the Board of Regents, Coffman said.

The Board of Regents will be discussing the 1989-90 recommendations for tenure and promotion at their April meeting, he said. Coffman will probably be making 35 tenure recommendations.

"The quality of the University directly relates to the quality of the faculty," Coffman said.

not very troublesome when considering that Richmond is maturing and he can only get better.

Golden State coach Don Nelson knows his star rookie is going to make mistakes, such as an ill-advised pass that cost the Warriors a game against Boston earlier in the year. Richmond reportedly shouldered the blame afterward, just as he often did at K-State, feeling that his mistakes are much more key than the mistakes of others. Nelson said that is too much of a burden for a rookie to take on. But then again this rookie is Mitch Richmond. That's the way he is.

Right now Richmond is leading all NBA rookies with an average of almost 21 points a game. He is also averaging six rebounds and four assists. Richmond could very well have landed a spot in Sunday's NBA All-Star game had it not been for fellow-Warrior Mullin also having a standout year, averaging nearly 28 points a game.

Mullin, in his third year, and Richmond have combined to help pull Golden State out of the cellar of the NBA's Western Conference Pacific Division. The Warriors are 24-19 after winning only 20 games last season.

So the book is finally out on Richmond. Not only can he play in the NBA, but he has also been able to dominate at times, as is evident from several 30-point games.

From the article in Sports Illustrated, it is also nice to see that Richmond remains complacent as ever — not letting the numbers of his six-figure contract go to his head. He's just out to do his job, that's all.

everything that could be done to address the concerns voiced at the December meeting.

Despite revisions, the rezoning proposal met with objections from both the planning board and members of the public present at the meeting.

Weisenburger said without a land-use plan, several problems would result in the area, one being traffic.

Some homeowners in student-populated neighborhoods said they saw apartment complexes built several years ago when K-State's enrollment was down and believe there is no emergency situation in regards to student housing.

The rezoning proposal will go before the City Commission again Febuary 21. The commission may still approve it, even though the planning board has voted against it.

Changes occur in microwave use

By Gary Lytle
Collegian Reporter

In the 32 years since the first home microwave oven was introduced, considerable changes have occurred in its technology and methods of use.

According to "Good Housekeeping" magazine, Tappan Appliances of Mansfield, Ohio, introduced the first microwave oven designed for the home in 1955. The "electronic range," as it was called, weighed 170 pounds, operated on 220 voltage, had a power output of 1,000 watts, and sold for $1,195.

Since its introduction, the microwave has gained considerable popularity, said Patty Annis, assistant professor of clothing textiles and interior design.

"About 75 percent of the people who live with wired homes ... now have microwave ovens," Annis said.

However, despite the popularity, the sales of ovens have leveled and are expected to decline during the next year, she said.

To counter the slump in sales, manufacturers are combining other types of cooking methods with the microwave oven. One example is an oven that broils, bakes and microwaves, she said.

Lisa Hankle, senior in economics and an employee at Williams Appliance Service, said the typical bottom-of-the-line combination oven which browns, bakes and broils will cost about $130.

The opposite end of the spectrum offers ovens which can cook conventionally, by microwaves or convection and cost as much as $3,000, Hankle said.

Although more combination ovens are on the market, standard microwave ovens are still very popular, she said.

A new trend among manufacturers of microwave ovens is increasing the warranty period for their products, Hankle said.

A typical warranty period used to be one year. Today, some microwave ovens have a three-year warranty on the entire oven and a 10-year warranty on the control panel and the megatron tube, which produces the microwaves.

The most common problem with microwave ovens is blowing a fuse, often caused from connecting the oven to an extension cord with other appliances, Hankle said.

The price of a fuse is about $4.50; however, the labor charge to replace the fuse is about $25, she said.

Annis said microwave ovens need to be checked for wear around the door and door seal. If the oven door does not close properly or if the seal is worn, there is a possibility of excessive leakage of microwave radiation.

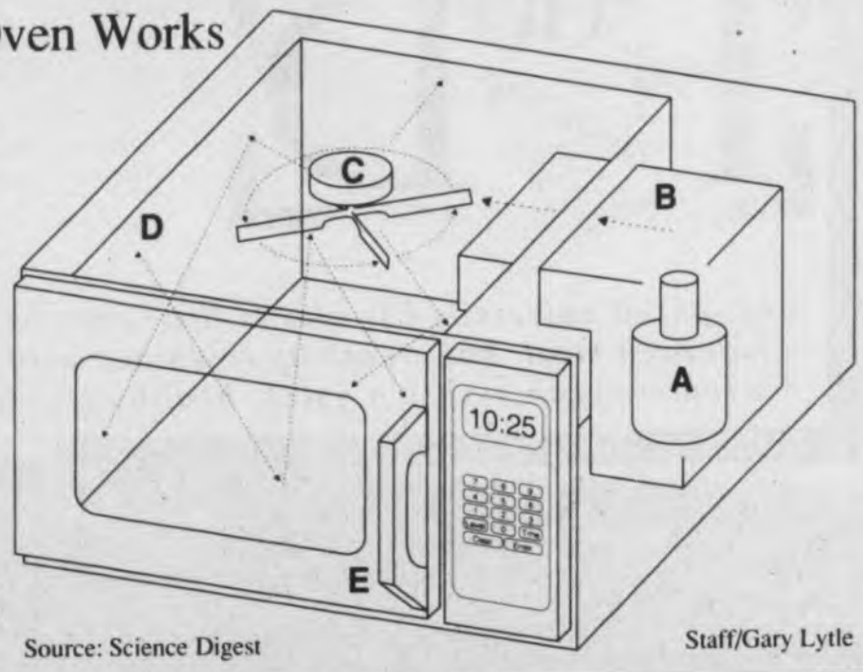
How A Microwave Oven Works



High-frequency electro-magnetic waves, or microwaves, are generated by the magnetron tube (A).

Microwaves travel from the magnetron through a wave guide (B) and enter the oven cavity through one or two openings at the top, bottom or sides.

The fan or rotating antenna (C) distributes microwaves throughout the oven cavity.

The metal walls (D) reflect the microwaves in all directions to evenly penetrate the food. The microwaves cause the food molecules to vibrate about 2 1/2 billion times per second, producing heat from friction.

When the oven is turned off, or the door (E) is opened, no microwaves are generated and none remain in the oven cavity.

Busy days prevent meal preparation

By Linda Kleiner
Collegian Reporter

Hurry to work. Hurry to class. Hurry to meetings. There just isn't enough time to prepare and eat a well-balanced meal.

However, meals which can be prepared in the microwave can reduce preparation time and change individuals' eating habits.

"Ideally, it is best to plan balanced meals for a week, but not many people do that," said Carole Harbers, associate professor of foods and nutrition.

One option to achieve a well-balanced diet is to consider meals as snacks, Harbers said. If individuals mentally review the items eaten during the day, they can plan one meal including foods that fulfill the requirements of the four food groups.

According to the Guide to Good Eating, adults need two servings from the milk group, two servings from the meat group, four servings from the fruit/vegetable group and four servings from the grain group.

"The average American eats the quota recommended from the meat and cereal groups," Harbers said. "Fruits, vegetables and milk products tend to get slighted a great deal."

"Nothing is quite so simple as the casserole," said Sharolyn Flaming, Riley County home economist. "Almost anything in the refrigerator can be used. Leftover turkey, chicken, beef or tuna combined with vegetables, noodles and a cream soup or cheese sauce can make a tasty, well-balanced and economical meal.

"A good management technique might be to brown meat in the microwave while the pasta is cooking on the range," Flaming said.

Harbers said browning meat in a microwave can be achieved by using a cooking colander with a pan underneath to catch the juices and frequently stirring the meat during the cooking process.

Microwave foods may have a slightly different appearance than conventionally cooked foods, Flaming said.

To enhance the appearance of microwave foods, various browning agents can create flavor and a pleasing appearance, she said.

Harbers said arranging food in a circle and using round bowls or casserole dishes will make microwave cooking more efficient.

The microwave is also excellent for reheating because the food tastes similar to freshly cooked foods, she said.

"Meats cooked by another method and re-heated in the microwave are great," Harbers said.

Flaming suggested the following tips for re-heating food in the microwave:

- Allow 1½ minutes for each cup of casserole or sauce.
- Allow five to 10 seconds per roll heated at a full-power setting.
- Allow 2 to 2½ minutes for each pound of cooked meat.
- Allow 1½ to 2 minutes per cup of pasta, rice or potatoes.
- Cook at 80 percent power unless the food can be stirred, then use 100 percent power.

A quick and easy way to fix an additional meal is to double the ingredients when cooking and freeze half of the food, Flaming said.

"The freezer and microwave can be used in a combined effort," she said. "Pop the dish from the freezer into microwave for a meal in a jiffy."

Flaming said a few do's and don'ts apply

POPCORN GALORE

By Collegian Staff

Popcorn, that ever-famous snack, has come a long way since the Indians first popped it over a blazing campfire.

According to the American Institute for Cancer Research Newsletter: "Americans ate 11.9 billion quarts of popcorn last year or an average 46 quarts of popped popcorn per person, up 59 percent from 1986.

"If popcorn's popularity makes it the fastest growing snack food in America, microwave varieties dominate the market."

Of the 52 percent of Americans who own microwaves, one-half make popcorn in the microwave at least once a week, reported the newsletter.

A taste test comparing the preferences of 40 K-State students concluded buttered popcorn was the most popular of the three tested varieties - butter, cheddar cheese and butter toffee popcorn.

Fifty percent of the participants preferred buttered popcorn, 35 percent preferred cheddar cheese and 15 percent preferred butter toffee.

Melissa Hiker, junior in secondary education, said, "I like the cheddar cheese the best because it is in between - not sweet like the butter toffee and better than plain popcorn."

Amy Lemon, junior in finance, had a different reason for her choice.

"I like the butter toffee the best because I'm on a diet, and its sweetness is a change," Lemon said.

However, according to the newsletter, microwave popcorn can be a nutritionally questionable snack. Air-popped popcorn contains fiber and about 25 calories per cup. Microwave popcorn contains saturated fats, salts, flavoring and preservatives.

"A typical two-to-three serving pouch contains between 4.5 and 7.9 teaspoons of fat, a hefty and not too healthy helping," stated the newsletter.

With more than 70 different brands, microwave popcorns dominate the shelves.

Kay Carpenter, manager of corporate communications for Beatrice Hunt-Wesson Inc. said, the company didn't know what the demand for microwave popcorn would be like.

"There were no statistics at the time we introduced (the popcorn) into the market in 1983," she said. "We really didn't know how popular it would be, it exceeded all our expectations."

Eric Sutton, grocery manager for the Dillion Stores in Westloop said the store has not had microwave popcorn selections for more than four years, but the progress in sales has "taken off."

"I would say the popularity of (microwave popcorn) stems from the fact that it is so easy to use, even a child can do it, Carpenter said. "And afterwards, there is no mess to clean up."

Storage cuts food waste

By The Collegian Staff

Individuals who live alone or only prepare food for a small number of people should be aware of food storage methods to reduce food waste, said Karen Penner, extension specialist in food science.

"College students with busy time schedules sometimes don't get around to eating food in the refrigerator before it spoils," Penner said. "The (prolonged storage) leads to a lot of food waste, which is a problem for college students that are on a tight budget."

Mold is the most common problem for foods sitting in the refrigerator. Covering food tightly and promptly after preparation can decrease the mold spores and other contaminants from landing on it, she said.

"Storing leftovers that are covered and are put into the refrigerator as soon as possible after they are cooked will still be fit to eat for one or two days," Penner said. "After one or two days, the food will start to get moldy or will start to dry out."

According to a pamphlet prepared by the K-State Cooperative Extension Service, certain food types store better than others. The best candidates for growing bacteria are low-acid foods such as meat, fish, poultry meats, milk, eggs and cooked vegetables.

"Acid inhibits spoilage bacteria and other bacteria that can cause illness," Penner said. "Acid helps to preserve food, and foods with a higher acidity will keep longer."

According to the pamphlet, uncooked ground meats — such as hamburger or stew meats — will spoil within one to two days in the refrigerator. Solid meats including steaks and roasts will last two to three days when refrigerated.

Martha Olson, head dietician for Lafene Student Health Center, said, ground meats have increased surface area, which means they have a higher chance of spoilage.

"Since there is more surface area, it is more likely for contaminants to invade the meat," she said.

"If you know you aren't going to eat the meat before it spoils, put it in a heavy plastic bag or a plastic container and put it in the freezer," Penner said.

"When you are ready to use the meat, thaw it out either slowly in the refrigerator or fast in the microwave at a medium

EDIBLE CREATIONS

Imagination is the main ingredient used by food preparers to create an attractive garnish with fruits and vegetables to accompany an item, said John Dienhart, instructor of hotel and restaurant management.

By using creativity, vegetables and fruits can be made into baskets, flowers and creative appetizers, making the simplest food a colorful display, Dienhart said.

"(Individuals) are not only trying to present a food, but also sell it," he said, adding that the way a food appears can decide whether it will be eaten.

Debbie Reed and Julie Engroff, sophomores in hotel and restaurant management, created a melon swan in their commercial foods class. They drew the swan on the honeydew melon and cut along the markings. Pineapple, grapes, kiwi and other fruits were used to fill the swan after hollowing the fruit from the melon. The swan was placed on a bed of lettuce.

"It was a learning experience," Engroff said.

Because this was their first attempt, the swan was completed in about 45 minutes, she said.

Barbara Depew, production dietician with the Union Food Service, said about 50 percent of the garnishes are eaten.

"(Garnishes) encourage (people) to eat more of the other food," Depew said. "It is the arrangement of foods that create their appetizing appeal."

She said the most common form of garnish used on tea sandwiches is the tomato rose. The peel of a tomato is cut thinly with a paring knife into a spiral strip. The strip is wrapped to form a rose with a small lettuce leaf and placed on the sandwich.

Vegetable trays are colorful and do not need much garnishing, Depew said. Fancy cuts such as a ripple or curl of the vegetables can be made.

Another colorful garnish is the onion mum, Dienhart said. Using a paring knife, cut the onion several times from different angles three-fourths of the way through toward the root end. With a toothpick in the root, immerse the onion in hot water for one minute to remove the odor. The onion is then set in cold water to open the petals. Food coloring can be added to create a variety of colored mums.

In the art of garnishing, individuals use their imagination first; the skill comes later, he said.

Market caters to microwave needs

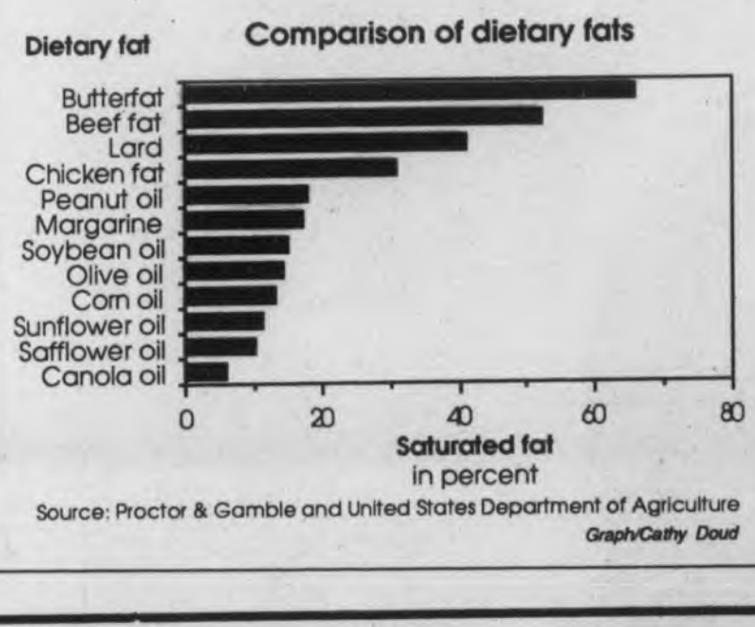
By Paige Gantz
Collegian Reporter

No matter what an individual is hungry for — meat, bread, breakfast foods, desserts or a complete meal — the microwave food market can provide various food selections without the fuss and time of preparing the meal.

According to a written report prepared by Karen Penner, extension specialist in food science, 55 percent of the U.S. households have microwave ovens.

"Microwave ovens are no longer considered a luxury item," Penner said. "Instead, (microwaves) have become a standard piece of household equipment.

"Microwavable foods are becoming more and more popular, convenient and a faster method of food preparation," she said. "Many food (producers) are now developing new food products and packaging them in containers for use in both conventional and microwave ovens."



Hormel has introduced Top Shelf, a group of microwavable products that are storable at room temperature. This product combines "thermoprocessing and plastic-multilayered packaging," Penner said.

"(The product) goes through a retort process, which is a commercial canner," she said. "In essence, it sterilizes the product with sufficient heat to destroy the bacteria.

"It's basically a milder canning process than a can of tuna would go through. The container is functioning as a can."

Top Shelf is available in 10 varieties. For $2.09, an individual can buy a main course of linguini with white clam sauce or italian style lasagna. For people counting calories, each selection contains 350 calories.

High fat levels in snacks may lead to heart disease

By Linda Kleiner
Collegian Reporter

Beware of those favorite snacks — potato chips, crackers and cookies — that are munched while watching television or studying for the big exam. These snacks can contribute to the risk of heart disease and stroke because they contain saturated fat.

"All (processed) snacks contain saturated fat, but some less than others," said Carole Harbers, associate professor of foods and nutrition.

However, there is an alternative to snacks concentrated with saturated fats. Products containing unsaturated fats can cause less damage to the body.

"Dietary fat influences the amount of fat in the blood," said Charlie Hedgcoth Jr., professor of biochemistry.

"The difference between saturated and unsaturated fat is unsaturated fat contains double-bonds within a molecule," he said. "The double-bonds of unsaturated fat give different properties and, in turn, has an effect on what happens to fat in the body."

"Unsaturated fats lead to a lower level of fat in the blood than the saturated fats," Hedgcoth said. "Therefore, unsaturated fat causes less of a problem in coronary heart disease."

Gadgets fun, enhance expertise

By The Collegian Staff

Basic kitchen utensils are essential to any chef's success in preparing a meal, but kitchen gadgets can be fun to use and add to a chef's expertise.

Among three Manhattan kitchen specialty stores surveyed, Butterfields Etc. in Manhattan Town Center, Functions in Aggieville, and Kitchens Plus in Westloop, store representatives said the best selling "kitchen gadgets" were wooden and plastic spoons, cookie cutters, woks, espresso makers and garlic presses.

In addition, the basic utensils purchased by students included wooden spoons, spatulas, measuring spoons, corkscrews, wisks, peppermills and ice cream scoops.

"Most students won't spend money on themselves and they don't buy too many unusual gadgets," said Pat Ball, owner of Functions. "Some students will come in and buy a piece or two and come back the next month to buy another."

Leslie Throm, manager of Butterfields, said she wouldn't be without a potato peeler, a can opener, a bottle opener and a blender.

Rachael Cunnick, senior in food and nutrition-exercise science, said there are three items she used extensively in her kitchen — wooden spoons, a pepper mill and a wok. She also used a blender to make breakfast drinks.

The stores' representatives listed other non-basic but sought-after items such as taco racks, magnets, grapefruit spoons, popcorn poppers and bowls, vegetable steamers and espresso grinders.

Cookie cutters, including those made of copper, are popular and are used primarily for decorative purposes, said Kathy Phillips, sales associate at Kitchens Plus.

Butterfields has about 70 different types of cookie cutters.

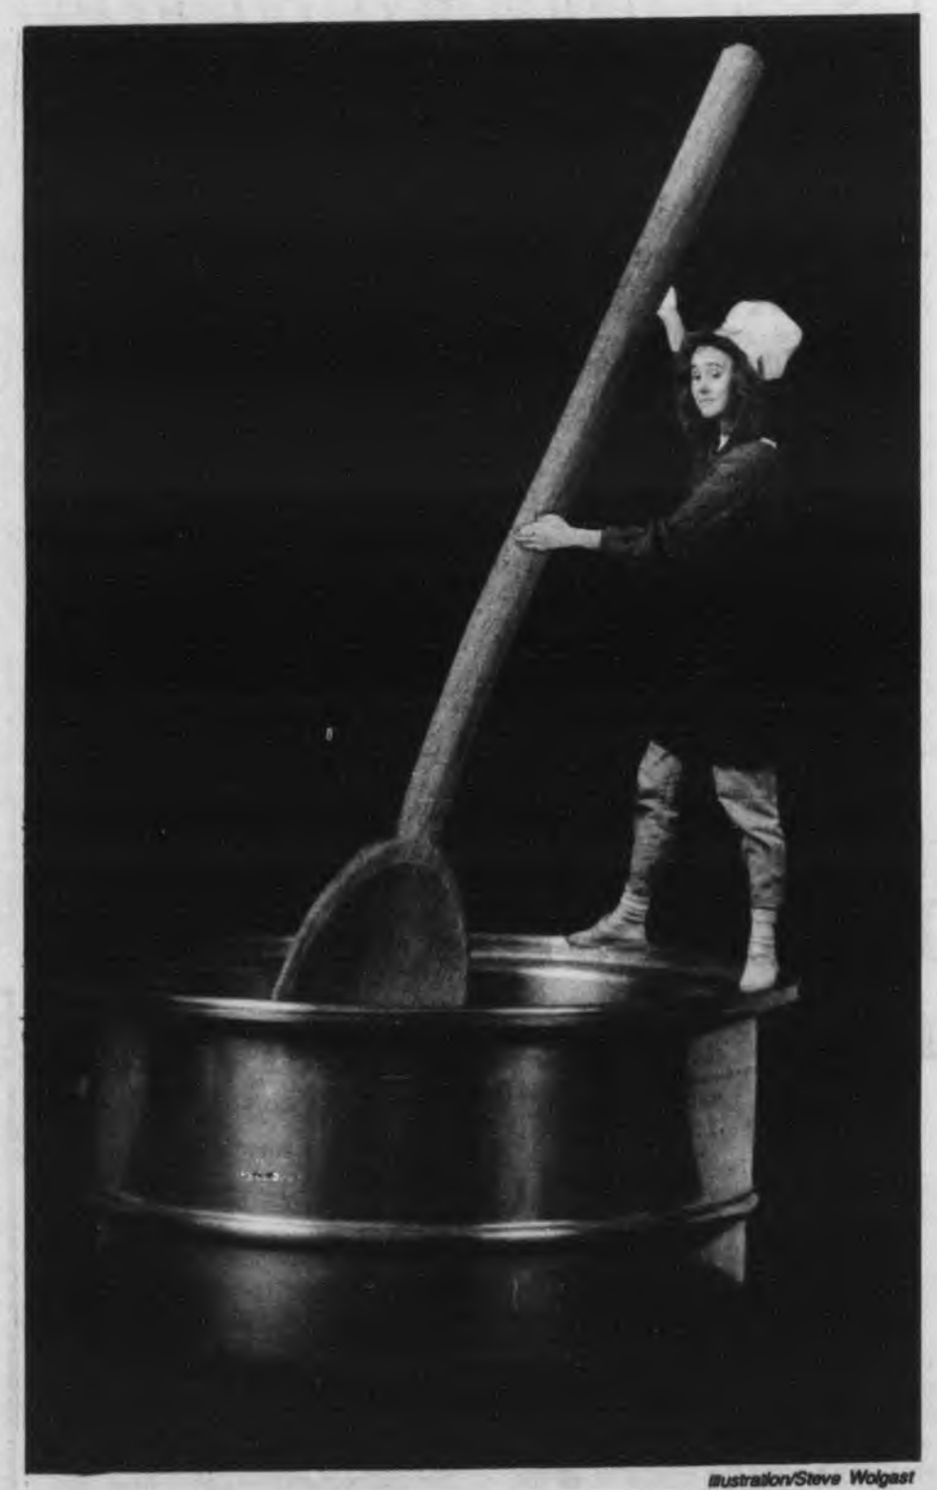
One of the newest gadgets Kitchens Plus has is a hand-held vegetable cutter with rollers that can be used to cut homemade noodles, Phillips said.

An extremely popular item in cookware is "Cushionaire" pans, insulated baking pans that have two bottom surfaces with a cushion of air between the surfaces, she said. Kitchens Plus sells about two such items daily.

Cutting boards made of polyethylene instead of wood are a functional and popular item, Phillips said. Polyethylene is a material that is able to be sanded to create a new surface.

Health departments and restaurants do not allow the use of wooden boards because they can harbor bacteria, she said. The sanding feature of the polyethylene boards eliminates the possibility of bacteria growing on the surface of the board.

Popular Christmas gadgets were rosette irons, tart pans and Christmas cookie cutters, Phillips said.



Unusual, yet requested items at Butterfields are an egg timer and pizza shears, said Throng, sophomore in marketing and management.

Gadgets which haven't been popular include mushroom cleaning brushes and curlicue french fry cutters, she said.

"'Oh Mom, we need this,'is a comment (employees) hear a lot," said Susan Weisenburger, sales associate at Butterfields.

Phillips said, "More serious cooks will purchase more expensive utensils."

For an example, a garlic press with a cleaner costs $13.95 and is one of the most popular gadgets customers purchase, she said. Less expensive versions without cleaners sell for $6.95; however, consumers will buy the more expensive press because cleaners can not be purchased separately.

Food labels list item's contents

Listing regulated by FDA

By The Collegian Staff

As attractive and informative as food labels are designed to be, the information can be confusing to health-conscious consumers.

"Labels can be wonderful educational tools if we know how to use them properly," said Carole Harbers, associate professor of foods and nutrition.

Contents and preservatives are listed in decreasing amounts due to Food and Drug Administration's requirements. Sodium content must be listed, but calorie information is optional. Nutritional information must be listed if a product has been fortified (adding nutrients to the product) or if a nutritional claim is made by the manufacturer, she said.

The artificial colorings that must be listed are Food Drug and Cosmetics Act yellow 5 and FD&C yellow 6. An example of a product that contains both yellow 5 and 6 is Peanut M&Ms. These artificial colorings have been associated with causing some allergic reactions, Harbers said.

"Labels are there for convenience, but the information on the labels can be confusing because it's listed in milligrams. If (producers) listed the ingredients in terms of ounces it would probably show .0001 (ounce) or something like that, which would be much more confusing," she said.

Harbers said, "It's usually pretty easy to remember that 454 grams is equal to one pound and that a teaspoon of salt is equal to about 2,000 milligrams (of salt)."

She said terms like "lite" or "light" can be very misleading.

"Light can mean that a meat product has 25 percent less fat than a comparable product, or with other products it can mean just about whatever the manufacturer wants it to," Harbers said.

According to the American Institute for Cancer Research Newsletter, terms such as "lite" or "light", "natural," or "organic" do not have standard definitions.

"'Lite' can refer to color, taste, texture, calories or weight. Lite olive oil, for instance, is milder in flavor and lighter in color than regular olive oil, but the fat and calorie content are the same," as stated in the newsletter.

Jim Peterson, manager of the Dillon's Store in Westloop Shopping Center, said the Dillon's main office in Hutchinson gives some consideration to the nutritional value of foods which are stocked, but products are selected mainly by consumer demands.

"Oat bran products are in high demand right now, so I'm sure we're going to allocate a lot a space for that," Peterson said. "In fact, we'll probably carry (products) that have the words oat bran on (the label)."

Harbers said a healthy diet can usually be maintained by following the United States Department of Agriculture guidelines and striving for variety and balance.

The USDA and the Human Nutrition Information Service have published a list of guidelines for maintaining a healthy diet. The guidelines include the following: eat a variety of foods from each of the four food groups; maintain a desirable weight; avoid eating excessive amounts of saturated fat, cholesterol, sugar and sodium; eat foods with adequate starch and fiber; and, if drinking alcoholic beverages, do so in moderation.

Product label definitions

Lean: No more than 10 percent fat by weight.
Extra Lean: No more than 5 percent fat by weight.
Leaner: At least 25 percent less fat (by weight) than the original product.
Dietetic: One or more ingredient (usually sodium or sugar) has been changed, substituted or restricted.
Sugar-free/Sugarless: Contains no sucrose (table sugar), but might contain corn syrup, fructose, honey, sorbital or other sweeteners. Not necessarily low in calories.
Sodium -free: No more than 5 mg sodium per serving.
Very Low Sodium; No more than 35 mg sodium per serving.

Professor: Cravings natural tendencies

By Darren Keller
Collegian Reporter

After a long, difficult day of looking at chalkboards, scribbling notes and reading texts, students may suddenly crave a snack.

Marty Mosier, junior in accounting, said he gets a craving for food after studying late.

"I crave submarine sandwiches at night because they're light and filling," Mosier said. "My jaw muscles tingle when I think about it. I picture the sandwich in my mind and think about sinking my teeth into the bread and hearing the crunch of all the vegetables."

John Stephenson, sophomore in journalism and mass communications, said he craves chocolate, pickles and fettuccine.

"I crave things if I haven't eaten them in a long time," Stephenson said.

Leon Rappoport, professor of psychology, said the cravings Stephenson and Mosier experienced are normal, automatic, physiological desires for food and everyone has had them at one time or another.

"Cravings sometimes develop from boredom or while doing something routine," Rappoport said. "When you aren't doing something interesting, you think about it more often. At that point, you can make life more interesting by thinking about a food item you particularly enjoy."

He said cravings are a way of rewarding oneself after an accomplishment.

"People usually don't get a sudden crave while parachuting, but after a big day of (parachuting), the craves start because (the individuals) feel they deserve it," Rapoport said.

"Some people may crave a cigarette after sex for the same reason," he said.

Kathy Grunewald, associate professor of foods and nutrition, published an article about the correlation between craving food and menstrual cycles.

"There is significant evidence that women crave chocolate more during certain parts of menstruation," Grunewald said. "This is probably because chocolate has magnesium in it, a chemical that is also in blood."

She said people crave certain foods they enjoy simply because they're hungry.

Mary Clarke, Extension specialist for nutrition education, said, "Pregnant women, particularly black, in the southern United States crave pica (a type of clay) due to an iron deficiency."

These women are often diagnosed with anemia, she said. The cultural phenomenon has been passed through the generations, but pica cravings aren't a good guide for nutrient deficiency.

Rappoport said craving can also be contributed to the nature/nurture principle.

"Sweetness is a surrogate for the mother's breast," he said.

"The satisfaction of consuming what you crave is associated with the pleasure and bliss of suckling," Rappoport said. "It's not necessarily the flavor of the milk that causes the craves, but the gratification and enjoyment the child receives from the mother holding, loving and caring for (the baby). The natural desire for sweets is

The consortium's 16-member board of directors is composed of four members each from the University, the Chamber of Commerce, the KSU Foundation and two members each from the City of Manhattan and Riley County. The Manhattan city manager and the Riley County director of public works are ex-officio members.

"Everybody is represented on the board. Everyone is affected directly and indirectly. Those individuals on the board are the most qualified professionals available," Boyd said. "We have the core of administrators from all of the public institutions."

Before further steps are taken to develop plans for any of the remaining 11 possible sites, Muir said members of the consortium would like the agencies involved to again voice their support of the multi-purpose park concept.

"Miller Tract is a project. The consortium is a conglomeration of people with the same concept," he said. "We need a show of support for the concept."

Based on the Freilich report, members of the consortium chose the Miller Tract, which is located near the Manhattan Municipal Airport, from the field of prospective locations. The sites were evaluated on 10 basic criteria.

Yogurt low in calories, satisfies need for sweets

By Steve Logback
Collegian Reporter

Frozen yogurt has emerged as a product to satisfy individuals concerned with good health, yet unwilling to sacrifice the good taste of ice cream.

Andrew Appleton, junior in accounting and finance, said he eats frozen yogurt for its nutritional advantages.

"Knowing that it's low in calories makes me feel better about myself," Appleton said. "It's a good study break and instead of getting a pizza, I can go out and get yogurt which I know is better for me."

Kerry Tarrant, junior in public relations, said she enjoys frozen yogurt after a long day of classes.

"Frozen yogurt is a sweet, refreshing treat without the calories and fat of most snacks," Tarrant said.

Frozen yogurt serves as more than a snack for students in need of a quick meal.

"Several times, I have found frozen yogurt to be a good substitute for a meal when I'm in a rush and don't have time to sit down and eat," said Amy McAnarney, senior in accounting.

I Can't Believe It's Yogurt is one business which caters to local yogurt lovers.

Larry Boyd, manager of ICBIY, said the store has gained popularity since its opening in 1985.

"We've had more customers come in every year," Boyd said.

Brad Barth, junior in biology and political science, said students visit ICBIY for its social atmosphere.

"I think it (ICBIY) is a great place to take a date," Barth said. "I would rather have frozen yogurt on a date than just a Coke and fries."

ICBIY promotes its frozen yogurt as all-natural, made with farm-fresh milk, cane and corn sugars, select fruit flavorings and active yogurt cultures.

"(ICBIY's yogurt) is designed to be gourmet frozen yogurt that tastes like ice cream," Boyd said.

Oasis Ice Cream and Frozen Yogurt located in the Manhattan Town Center has recently entered the local frozen yogurt market.

Oasis opened in August and offers a daily selection of four flavors of frozen yogurt.

"We've been real busy, especially on the weekends," said Katie Aldis, an Oasis employee.

The Dillons store located in Westloop has sold frozen yogurt for two years.

A self-service machine was positioned in the front section of the store in November, said Celeste Coonrod, assistant deli manager.

Since November, sales have been increasing, Coonrod said.

The Union Stateroom cafeteria offers frozen yogurt but has experienced a decrease in sales since 1984, said Becky Lind, Stateroom dietician.

"Student response was very high, but there has been a dramatic decrease since then," Lind said.

The cafeteria offers three flavors of yogurt — raspberry, strawberry and chocolate, she said. There are no immediate plans of adding more flavors because of previous unsuccessful attempts in introducing new flavors.

One drawback of frozen yogurt is its cost when compared to that of ice cream.

"I figure that the cost is justified in return for the extra nutritional benefits I get from eating yogurt," Appleton said.

"The future is good, but it is going to be very competitive because a lot of different people are trying to sell yogurt," Boyd said.

According to the American Institute for Cancer Research Newsletter, a quart of milk can be made into a quart of yogurt overnight with a low-fat yogurt maker.

The newsletter reported frozen yogurt can also be made in an ice cream maker by freezing yogurt with fruit juice concentrate and fresh fruit pieces.

medium-low setting," she said.

Olson said prepared meat products — such as spaghetti sauce, taco meat or pizza — will last three to four days in the refrigerator, but before eaten, should be thoroughly heated to temperatures more than 180 degrees to 212 degrees Fahrenheit.

Prepared meats can be frozen.

"If you are living by yourself and you buy one pound of hamburger, brown it all and keep the portions you don't use in the freezer," Penner said. "Then you have meat that you can re-heat for chili or for tacos."

Salads including tuna fish or chicken and other salads in which you combine many different foods do not store well, Penner said.

According to the pamphlet, fresh fruits can last as long as one week, and citrus fruits last three weeks. Fresh vegetables last one to two weeks, but vegetables such as mushrooms, shredded cabbage and lettuce, ripe tomatoes and beans remain fresh one or two days. The fresh items are best stored in the crisper or moisture-resistant bags.

Dairy products, which usually have expiration dates located on the package, should be used by that date to ensure the highest quality.

"More presence of fat in the blood presents a greater chance of cardiovascular disease," he said.

Harbers said, "It is important to read the label on products. Look for products made with unsaturated fat (vegetable oil, safflower oil, sunflower oil, corn oil, soybean oil and peanut oil) because they contain less saturated fat than the animal fat or tropical oil (coconut and palm oil) does."

The best snack foods are fresh fruits and vegetables, she said. Other good snacks are popcorn without butter, pretzels and soft pretzels.

"Eating potato chips on a plate at lunch along with other nutritious foods will not be detrimental (to health)," Harbers said. "It is harmful when someone sits down while watching television or studying and devours a whole bag of potato chips."

"It is difficult for nutritionists and health professionals to make a statement (concerning eating habits) that is going to apply to everybody," Harbers said. "Everyone is an individual — the metabolism differs, lifestyle differs and level of exercise differs. What is applicable to one person is totally inappropriate for another person."

Harbers said a physical exam, cholesterol check and blood profile would determine if individuals need to be concerned about their fat intake. From the medical results, the correct balanced diet can be prescribed.

Food companies and fast food manufacturers that have changed to less-saturated vegetable oils for some or all of their products include the following:

- Frito-Lay, Lance, Specialty Bakers and McKee Baking snack food companies.
- Stouffer's frozen foods.
- Sunshine Biscuits cookie and cracker products.
- Pepperidge Farm bread products.
- McDonald's and Burger King — everything except potatos.
- Hardees.
- Taco Bell.

One of Hormel's competitors, Doubletree Food, offers 15 selections in its Lunch Bucket line, which can be prepared in about one minute.

Other non-frozen microwave food items include Betty Crocker's MicroRave cake and brownie mixes. The items are packaged with special disposable pans made for the microwave.

"There has been extreme growth in frozen entrees and meals," Penner said.

One of the newest members to this group is the MicroMagic microwave milkshake.

A person can put a milkshake in the microwave and in less than a minute, an ice cold vanilla, chocolate or strawberry shake can be stirred to the desired consistency. If the shake is too thick, it can heated an additional 10 seconds.

Chef America has created Hot Pockets, adding a new dimension for pita bread.

Lean Pockets are similar to hot pockets, but have fewer calories — less than 300 calories per pocket.

combined with the mother's milk concept, and it is this combination that causes craves."

Rappoport said Adolf Hitler had abnormal chocolate candy binges known as food pathologies, which are not normal food cravings.

"People who feel abnormal compulsions to have binges may think they need a Coke to start the day or a martini to end it," he said.

Some symptoms of food pathology are the desire for a certain food because something else is missing in life, such as companionship. The person tries to bury the real problem under a pile of sweets, Rappoport said.

The craving is often more a symptom than it is a cause for abnormal consumption of certain foods, he said.

"Alcoholics crave alcohol because of addiction caused by some other underlying problem in their lives," Rappoport said. "It isn't because they enjoy the flavor of their drink so much that they crave it like a healthy person would crave cookies and milk."

Swing dancers meet for classes

By Jodi Johnson
Collegian Reporter

Dressed in anything from cowboy boots and cowboy hats, to tennis shoes and sweats, about 80 people participated in the swing dance class Tuesday in the Union.

The class was the first in a series of three classes offered this semester by the Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas Committee. It represents an idea started this semester by the committee which seeks to offer students a chance to "learn while doing," said Brad Amstein, junior in accounting and member of the Issues and Ideas Committee.

"We decided last December to have three classes that are informal and last one night (each)," Amstein said. "It gives the students a chance to learn something new in a few hours while having fun at the same time."

Rob Rezac, a freshman in feed science who was recruited by the committee to teach Tuesday's class, has been swing dancing for 10 years. Rezac and his partner Kari Krause, Manhattan, volunteered to teach the class to give others a chance to learn how to swing dance.

Swing dancing requires teamwork between the partners, Rezac said.

"Both people are really involved and it takes a little bit of coordination," he said. "There's a lot of teamwork involved and both partners have to communicate so they are aware of what move is coming up next."

Krause said a swing dance class will usually last about six weeks, but because Tuesday's class lasted only two hours, he and Rezac were going to teach the moves easiest to remember.

"I thought (offering the class) was a wonderful idea," said Ruth Berges, senior in elementary education. "I've wanted to learn to swing dance for a long time and since the class was free and here on campus, I decided to take advantage of the opportunity."

The Issues and Ideas Committee usually focuses on presenting speakers to discuss national and international issues, said Marilyn Woodward, program coordinator for UPC.

"The committee members decided they wanted to try the class concept to do something different and have a little bit of fun," Woodward said.

The committee will offer two other classes during the semester. An egg-dying class will be offered some time before Easter to children

Negotiations stall, talks break off on Miller Tract

By Janet Swanson
Editor

After eight months of "serious" negotiations and two years of discussions, the owners of the Miller Tract and members of The Bluemont Consortium have broken off talks.

Owners of the tract were given Friday as a deadline to accept or reject the consortium's latest purchase offer. They did not provide an answer.

"We gave them the best proposal possible and they chose not to accept it," said William Muir, consortium secretary-treasurer and K-State's director of economic development.

Although members of the consortium have not heard from the owners, Muir said if the consortium was contacted by the owners, talks might be reopened.

Details of the consortium's purchase offer have not been released.

Consortium Chairman Jack Golstein, in a letter to Manhattan Mayor Dave Fiser and Riley County Commission Chairman Wilton Thomas which informed them of the break in negotiations, suggested the consortium might join with the city and county in an application to the Kansas Technology Enterprise Corp.

The application would request funds for an analysis of alternative sites, in conjunction with an update of the Urban Area Land Use Plan and the Water/Sewage Treatment Plan.

Such a study, Muir said, could cost between $60,000 and $100,000. The amount of funds KTEC might provide is unknown.

"It can be exasperating, but call me an optimist. We still have several choices," Muir said.

A 1988 study pinpointed 12 possible sites for the proposed 850-acre, multi-purpose industrial-research park. Less than 100 acres would be dedicated for an industrial area. In the proposed Phase I, about 30 acres would be used for the University's center of research.

If built, the multi-purpose park could also include an 18-hole golf course, single- and multi-family housing units, a sports complex and an amphitheatre.

"It truly will be a mixed-use park. It'll be a place where people can live and work," Muir said.

Formed June 23, 1987, the consortium is "an unusual but workable" way to manage conceptualization of the proposed park, said William Boyd, president of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

The consortium's 16-member board of directors is composed of four members each from the University, the Chamber of Commerce, the KSU Foundation and two members each from the City of Manhattan and Riley County. The Manhattan city manager and the Riley County director of public works are ex-officio members.

"Everybody is represented on the board. Everyone is affected directly and indirectly. Those individuals on the board are the most qualified professionals available," Boyd said. "We have the core of administrators from all of the public institutions."

Before further steps are taken to develop plans for any of the remaining 11 possible sites, Muir said members of the consortium would like the agencies involved to again voice their support of the multi-purpose park concept.

"Miller Tract is a project. The consortium is a conglomeration of people with the same concept," he said. "We need a show of support for the concept."

Ideally, that show of support will be made within the next six weeks, Muir said.

The original $90,000 study, which determined the University's strengths and where ties could be made to Manhattan, was completed by the law firm of Freilich, Leitner, Carlisle and Shortlidge of Kansas City, Mo.

Based on the Freilich report, members of the consortium chose the Miller Tract, which is located near the Manhattan Municipal Airport, from the field of prospective locations. The sites were evaluated on 10 basic criteria.

Housing plan approved

Residents object to project's location

An attorney representing residents of the Sharingbrook housing area told the Manhattan City Commission Tuesday that approval of an adjacent housing project could create dangerous traffic situations in the area.

Despite the attorney's appeal, the commission members approved the motion to accept the public utility easements and rights-of-way for the 17-acre, 27-lot housing project. The proposed Cascade Hill Addition lies north of Sharingbrook.

Richard Seaton, a Manhattan attorney representing residents of the Sharingbrook housing area, said his clients did not oppose the construction of the Cascade Hill Addition, but were more concerned with the design of the access street, Lisa Lane.

"The people I represent are not opposed to the development," Seaton said. "(Lisa Lane) is a street with a whole lot of kinks in it."

The city could be liable in the event of an accident caused by a poorly designed or sub-standard access, he said. The developer and the city could be liable in a law suit.

City Attorney William Frost said the possibility of the city being sued for design flaws in the housing project was "extremely remote."

"If the city were sued sometime in the future ... I believe the city would receive immunity," Frost said.

Joe Knopp, an attorney representing the developer, said changing the design of the housing project would severely affect access to the area by emergency vehicles.

> "The people I represent are not opposed to the development."
> —Richard Seaton attorney

Bruce McCallum, director of public works, said the proposed design could handle the traffic flow.

When asked if the design was up to acceptable standards, McCallum responded, "... it is not sub-standard."

The motion passed three to one, with Commissioner Nancy Denning dissenting and Mayor Dave Fiser absent.

The commission also approved the following regular agenda items:

■ A request by the Steel and Pipe Supply Co. of Manhattan, on behalf of the Kansas State Bank, to convert the alley between the 500 block of Poyntz Avenue and Houston Street to one-way eastbound traffic flow.

The action would be necessary to accomodate a drive-up teller for the Kansas State Bank.

■ A request to move the bus loading area for Woodrow Wilson Elementary School to Leavenworth and Sixth streets. Loading and unloading was previously conducted on Juliette Avenue and Osage Street.

■ An action needed to acquire rights-of-way along Anderson Avenue for the Anderson Avenue Improvement Project. The city staff was unsuccessful in negotiating some right-of-way purchases necessary for the project.

■ A request for a $75,000 loan to the Riley County Senior Service Center for the purchase of a plot at 400 Leavenworth St. The Senior Center is located at 412 Leavenworth St.

The loan would be made with temporary bonds from the city's cash reserves and would be paid in four years.

Former college dean Trotter dies of apparent heart attack

By Mindy Robert
Collegian Reporter

Donald Trotter, former dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine, died Monday evening in his home of an apparent heart attack, said Dr. A. H. Miller, local physician.

Miller said an autopsy will not be performed.

Trotter, 68, was a faculty member at K-State for 30 years, serving as dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine from January 1972 to July 1984.

"We were all saddened and shocked to hear of Dr. Don M. Trotter's death," President Jon Wefald said.

"Dr. Trotter's commitment to Kansas State University and to the College of Veterinary Medicine are monumental," Wefald said. "During the 12 years that Dr. Trotter was dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine, the college made excellent progress in all areas.

"Dr. Trotter will be missed not only by the College of Veterinary Medicine and Kansas State University, but also by the community of Manhattan and the state of Kansas."

The Veterinary Medical Center was planned and completed during Trotter's tenure.

"Don Trotter's contributions to Kansas State University and the veterinary profession are truly formidable," Provost James Coffman said.

"During his 12 years as dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine, he provided the leadership to bring the current building complex into being," Coffman said. "He will be sorely missed by a host of students and colleagues."

The Veterinary Teaching Building was named in Trotter's honor. The building houses a library, three teaching laboratories, two classrooms and support facilities for the instruction program.

Trotter had ties to the University that extended beyond his position as a faculty member. He received his doctorate in veterinary medicine from K-State in 1946 and his master's degree in science in 1957.

Before joining the K-State faculty, Trotter taught at Iowa State University, the University of Missouri and Oklahoma State University. In 1956 he moved to K-State as an instructor in the Department of Anatomy and later was appointed head of the department.

Trotter served as associate dean prior to his appointment as acting dean, and later as dean, of the College of Veterinary Medicine in 1972. After stepping down as dean, Trotter remained a professor of anatomy.

Despite his retirement in 1986, Trotter was active with the University, said J. L. Noordsy, associate dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine.

Trotter contributed to a book written about the history of the College of Veterinary Medicine at K-State, Noordsy said. He was also active in the American Veterinary Medical Association and the American College of Veterinary Medical Educators.

Bjorn Borg taken to hospital

MILAN, Italy — Five-time Wimbledon champion Bjorn Borg swallowed barbiturates to ease an upset stomach, a friend said Tuesday, but a news agency reported the retired Swedish tennis player apparently had attempted suicide.

Borg, 32, was hospitalized at Milan Polyclinic for three hours Tuesday before he returned with his Italian fiancee, rock singer Loredana Berte, to her apartment.

The ANSA news agency said initial police investigations indicated Borg had tried to commit suicide but that it could not get official confirmation of its report.

Borg's personal adviser said he had taken barbiturates after becoming nauseous and another friend said Borg had been stricken by food poisoning.

"I'm fine, it's all over," Borg told reporters outside the apartment.

"Go away all of you," snapped Berte, 41, before slamming the door.

During the drive from the hospital, a photographer gave chase on foot and bumped into the couple's taxi, prompting the driver to get out and slap him.

Hospital officials confirmed that Borg had been treated, but refused to give any details.

ANSA quoted unidentified hospital sources as saying Borg apparently had swallowed about 10 pills.

Mara Savastano, a friend of the couple, said the singer told her that Borg had suffered from food poisoning.

S&Ls bailout plan beginning

WASHINGTON — Federal regulators, wasting no time in implementing portions of President Bush's savings and loan rescue plan, announced Tuesday that they had begun taking control of more than 200 insolvent savings and loans institutions which are still operating.

Officials of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., which insures deposits at commercial banks, and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corp., which performs the same function for S&Ls, announced that combined regulatory teams from the two agencies had been put into place at four insolvent S&Ls located in Maryland, Florida, California and Texas.

Within a month, officials said they hoped to have federal regulatory teams in place at approximately 224 S&Ls which are still operating even though they are technically insolvent.

The announcement came just a day after Bush unveiled the administration's plan to overhaul the S&L industry. Officials said they were moving with dispatch to emphasize the urgency of the problem.

Officials said that all of the insolvent S&Ls would continue normal operations. However, their operating decisions will be subject to approval from the federal regulators. The institutions will remain under government control until regulators can find buyers.

Regulators were urged to take this action last week by the General Accounting Office, the auditing arm of Congress. The GAO said that the sick S&Ls needed to be "effectively isolated" from the healthy segment of the industry.

In the past, the sick S&Ls have been able to offer higher rates of return in an effort to attract depositors' money, thereby bidding up the cost of funds for the total industry and increasing the ultimate cost to the government of bailouts.

Estimates have been that the industry's losses, including the insolvent institutions which were allowed to continue operating, was adding $1 billion a month to the total bailout cost.

City bans sale of weapons

LOS ANGELES — The City Council voted unanimously Tuesday to ban sales and possession of semiautomatic weapons such as the AK-47 rifle used to kill five schoolchildren in Stockton last month.

Holding aloft an Uzi rifle, Councilman Zev Yaroslavsky said, "There is absolutely no reason why anyone should own one of these. We are talking about offensive weapons of war."

After a noisy hour-long discussion by council members and the public, many of them gun owners who opposed the measure, the council voted 12-0 for the ban.

Violators of the ordinance will face up to six months in jail and a fine of up to $1,000. The ordinance applies to any semiautomatic rifle that holds 20 or more rounds or a semiautomatic shotgun that can be fired more than six times.

The measure was effective immediately. Owners of such guns have 15 days to get rid of the firearms or make them inoperable.

Mayor Tom Bradley, calling the weapons "tools of murder and mayhem whose sole purpose is killing human beings," promptly signed the measure into law.

Have pancakes, will travel

LIBERAL — A gym instructor who trained on a Welsh mountainside bested an aerobics teacher Tuesday in the annual Shrove Tuesday pancake race, keeping the championship in English hands for the seventh consecutive year.

Lesley Byrne, 26, of Olney, England, ran the 415-yard course, carrying a frying pan with a pancake, in 62 seconds. In the Kansas leg of the race, Donetta Schindler, 23, won with a time of 65.91 seconds, nearly four seconds slower.

Byrne, who won for the second straight year, said she trained by running down the highest mountain in the Snowdonia range, the 3,560-foot Snowdon in northern Wales.

"I'm thrilled to have won but I think the wind stopped me from breaking the record," she said. "My legs feel really bad. I thought I was fitter because I'd been training. I'll be coming back next year to try for the hat-trick (three wins)."

The women of Olney hold a series edge, 20-19.

In Liberal, Schindler ran past her 14 competitors but could not match the Olney time.

Town's theater revival sought

ST. FRANCIS — In the early 1950s, queues a block long would form in front of the marquee of the Cheyenne Theater.

Even with ticket prices of 41 cents for adults and 12 cents for children, the theater was a money-maker. Old ledgers show that the average attendance was more than 8,000 people a month.

But like many small theaters in rural Kansas towns, television, the easy mobility of the people, shrinking populations and the increasing cost of movies forced the business to close in the mid-1980s.

Townspeople now hope to reopen the theater with the help of a community development block grant and a fund-raising plan, said Jerry Rink, a member of a group of 25 people calling themselves "The Organizers."

The group is trying to raise $156,000 for the restoration, through a combination of donations and "selling" 375 theater seats at $100 each, Rink said.

A plaque will be attached to the back of each seat with the name of the person who buys it, he said.

Bringing back the theater "will be one heck of an asset for Cheyenne County," Rink said.

Movies would probably be shown on weekends, with the building used for other purposes during the week, he said.

Meetings to provide feedback

High school principals and counselors from across the state will be at K-State Feb. 16 to meet with their former students.

Richard Elkins, director of admissions, said the conference is designed to enhance educators' ability to prepare students for the transition from high school to college.

High school officials will be available to meet with their former students from 10:15 a.m. to 12:15 p.m. in Ahearn Field House and the Union,

"This time allows the high school to obtain feedback from former students, who can offer criticism, praise and suggestions concerning their high school's programs and methods which are used to help prepare students for college," Elkins said.

The principals and counselors will also attend two afternoon sessions. One will involve academic representatives who will respond to questions and comments raised in response to the meeting with students. The other will deal with student affairs relevant to college, such as housing and financial aid, Elkins said.

Aid given to businesses by entrepreneurial center

By Chris Koger
Staff Writer

Entrepreneurs trying to start a business are faced with a discouraging statistic: about 80 percent of new businesses fail within five years.

Until recently, Manhattan entrepreneurs were on their own when trying to get their businesses off the ground. Now they can employ the use of the Kansas Entrepreneurial Center in the Southwestern Bell building at 1640 Fairchild Ave.

KEC provides clients with guidance and financial planning during the "critical, early years," said John Walters, president of the center and executive vice president of the KSU Research Foundation.

"It's been found that businesses that have gone through the 'incubator' process have a much higher success ratio," Walters said. "They get help that is unavailable to most other businesses."

KEC was no more than an idea four and a half years ago, then Donald Rathbone, KEC chairman and dean of the College of Engineering, decided Manhattan needed a center designed to enhance economic growth in Manhattan.

"This kind of thinking was happening all over the country; a lot of 'business incubators' were opening," Rathbone said. "I felt it would help this community and the University to establish one in Manhattan."

A feasibility study showed Manhattan could support the center, and Rathbone said he chose Walters to follow through with the idea. Walters graduated from K-State in 1960 with a bachelor's degree in electrical engineering and has served on the Engineering Advisory Council since 1980.

The center opened in October with funding from Pottawatomie and Riley counties, KSU Foundation, the College of Engineering, the Chamber of Commerce and the City of Manhattan. The city budgeted $15,000 to help fund the center.

The main support now comes from the Southwestern Bell Telephone Company, Walters said.

The center can accomodate five tenants, but Southwestern Bell is planning to allot Walters more space.

> "It's been found that businesses that have gone through the 'incubator' process have a much higher success ratio."
> —John Walters president, KEC

Because it takes a while for starting businesses to stabilize, none have "graduated" from the center, Walters said.

"There are many things involved when getting a business off the ground: a business plan, financial backing and community support," he said. "It can be a very time and money consuming project.

"Here, the only thing they really have to do is get a phone number. They don't have to worry about hiring a secretary, high rent and limited facilities," Walters said. "We make it so our clients have the least amount of things to worry about."

He said ground rules are set concerning prospective clients. They must have a business plan showing that their business is marketable and has growth potential.

"We want clients who have technology-oriented businesses, because there is a large amount of growth in that field," Walters said.

"This is not a low-cost, multi-tenant facility; we won't allow a retailer to set up in the center," Walters said. "We want people in here with ideas about products or services."

The Association of Collegiate Entrepreneurs is a client at the center. Walters said they are a unique client because they aren't a business.

"They're not actually trying to start a business, but their club is involved in business ideas and innovations," he said.

Mark Davis, president of ACE and junior in agricultural economics, said the center has given the club support and advice.

"It's a real good deal because they help us so we don't end up making mistakes," Davis said. "Our club is designed for students with business ideas, which fits in so well with what the center does."

The center could be instrumental to the community and the University, Davis said.

"There is a lot of technology developed at K-State that goes out of Manhattan and Kansas," he said. "With the center, we have the chance to keep some of it here in Manhattan."

Walters agreed.

"I'm from Kansas and I think we need to keep our knowledge and resources from going out of the state," he said.

Friendship Tutoring program employs students as teachers

By Chris Koger
Staff Writer

For several hours every Thursday night, certain K-State students break from their own studies to help Manhattan elementary and high school students with their schoolwork through Friendship Tutoring.

The Friendship Tutoring program was established in 1963 for Manhattan elementary and high school students who have difficulties with their homework. Although anyone can volunteer to be a tutor in the program, most are K-State students.

Mary Connell, senior in elementary education, started as a tutor her freshman year. Five semesters later, she's still involved as a site coordinator for the seventh- through 12th-grade group.

"College students aren't around kids enough," Connell said. "We are too involved with our own world of classes and work, but this gives us the chance to see kids from different backgrounds.

"It's an important experience, especially for anyone who plans to have children or work with them."

Mark White, graduate student in human development and family studies, is director of the program.

About half of the 110 tutors are education majors who participate in the program to fulfill class requirements, White said. The other half have diverse backgrounds, including engineering, architecture and design majors; Manhattan Christian College students; and city residents.

"This is not just for K-State students; it's for anyone who wants to help children," White said. "They do it because they want to — not because they have to."

The tutors choose the age of the students they want to work with, then site coordinators match the tutors to the students.

The students are separated into four groups that meet every Thursday night at three area churches and the Manhattan Middle School. The groups are: first- and second-graders, third- and fourth-graders, fifth- and sixth-graders, and seventh- through 12th graders.

Some tutors have been in the program for five semesters or more, he said.

"We have a 'core' of students who come back again and again, because they had a good experience the first time," White said. "Others have told me they would do it again if it would fit into their schedules."

Vicki Monical, junior in English, has been in the tutoring program for five semesters and is a site coordinator for the fifth- and sixth-graders.

"Aside from helping the kids with schoolwork, we are sort of a role model to them," Monical said. "We encourage them to be active in school and do their homework."

Although the program emphasizes schoolwork, tutors are encouraged to establish a relationship with their pupil.

"There is a satisfaction knowing you've done something for them, especially when they look forward to seeing you each week," said Nancy Manning, senior in family life and human development.

"I think it's nice to show them you appreciate their effort by taking them to the mall or a ballgame," Manning said.

Although the time spent with the students is minimal, White said the results are remarkable.

"It's amazing that so much progress can be made from just one and a half hours a week," he said. "The one-on-one relationship with the tutor can change the child's negative outlook on school and get them motivated."

Agricultural research neglects small farms

Could K-State be the target of a lawsuit for its role in the farm crisis? This is one of several questions that should be addressed at 7:30 p.m. Thursday in the Union Ballroom when Debra Jones discusses how research conducted at land grant universities affects rural America.

Jones is the director of the California Action Network, a membership based, nonprofit corporation primarily composed of students and faculty at the University of California at Davis.

In 1979, CAN initiated a successful lawsuit against UC-Davis for what its members saw as that university's indifference to rural communities, small farmers, farm workers and consumers.

The lawsuit centered around research funded by the Hatch Act of 1887, which set up the agricultural experiment stations at land grant universities to benefit small farmers, consumers and rural communities.

Although the suit was heard in the California state court system and named UC-Davis as its defendant, it relied on a federal statute and thus could have an impact on the land grant institutions in all 50 states, including K-State.

The Citizen's Committee on Sustainable Agriculture, which includes several faculty members, students and Manhattan residents, is sponsoring Jones' visit.

Manhattan resident and committee member Jan Garton said Jones' visit should shed some light on whether K-State's situation is similar to that at UC-Davis.

"I think that's what we're going to find out. There are several similarities. I think that (Jones' visit) will help the University understand some of the reasons why the University of California was sued," she said.

Despite an increase this year in funding for sustainable agriculture research at K-State, the committee has yet to come to an agreement with the University on the definition of sustainable agriculture.

The committee defines sustainable agriculture as a type of agriculture that is economically, environmentally and socially sustainable. They contrast this with corporate farming, which is characterized by "high inputs" — heavy use of petrochemical products, such as herbicides, pesticides and fertilizers, and a much higher rate of soil erosion.

The committee points out that research at K-State and other land grant universities favors corporate farming at the expense of family farmers. This is clearly not what land grant universities were set up to do. Part of the problem is that most research is conducted as if it was scale neutral, that is, without consideration to who can afford the new developments.

Commentary

Scott Miller

Collegian Columnist

In their book "World Hunger: Twelve Myths," authors Frances Moore-Lappe and Joseph Collins argue that because most new developments in agriculture are beyond the means of small farmers, research and development tend overwhelmingly to benefit agribusiness at the expense of family farms.

"Introducing any new agricultural technology into a social system stacked in favor of the rich and against the poor — without addressing the social questions of access to the technology's benefits — will over time lead to an even greater concentration of the rewards from agriculture, as is happening in the United States," Collins and Moore-Lappe write.

This is the essence of the farm crisis. University research favors mechanization and labor saving devices which mean fewer jobs. To many this may not seem so bad. After all, that's what makes free enterprise go — constantly renewing capital so as to make production cheaper.

Even if one ignores the drastic social upheaval this process causes in rural communities — uprooting families, throwing people out of work and fostering an antidemocratic structure by putting more control of agriculture in fewer and fewer hands — the fact remains that lower production costs have not been passed on to the consumer. In general, as production costs have dropped, agribusiness firms have retained or even increased their prices.

Petrochemical products, such as pesticides and herbicides, provide one of the most obvious examples of how university research undermines small farmers, the consumer and the environment while increasing the control of a few large corporations over food production.

Because petrochemicals are so expensive, they are used much more by the large corporate farms which can afford them. In some areas of the world, pesticide use accounts for half of all production costs.

Again, even ignoring the concentration of wealth and resources this fosters, the fact remains that run-off from these products has a long term detrimental effect on the environment.

In fact, that was the conclusion of a study released in June by the Kansas Department of Health and Environment which pointed to petrochemical run-off as a cause of pollution in Tuttle Creek Reservoir.

Fred Bentley, director of the Kansas Rural Center, thinks it is "pretty clear" that K-State research has supported the use of petrochemicals.

This doesn't mean that K-State is necessarily responsible for the pollution of Tuttle Creek. On the other hand, it doesn't look as if K-State has done much to oppose it either.

In the name of academic freedom, many apologists for the present research agenda at land grant institutions claim that universities should not require that certain areas of research be emphasized or deemphasized.

But it stands to reason that research and extension activities that are publicly supported should primarily benefit the public interests. At K-State, more than 70 percent of agricultural research is publicly funded. By most accounts, however, that research primarily benefits private corporations.

Sluggish snow removal increases driving risks

It took the sun's rays and a warmer day for the snow to be removed from Manhattan streets — and they still aren't safe.

For the past four days, Manhattan residents have driven on icy roads under dangerous conditions. Even road conditions on Interstate 70 were much better than those within city limits.

For Manhattan residents, the first major snow of winter (which officially began Dec. 21) occurred Saturday morning. But residents had to wait until Sunday night to see snow removal equipment out, then until Tuesday afternoon to see snow disappear. That was when the sun started to shine.

At least it was safe to walk on campus.

After four days of poor road conditions (with the exception of Poyntz Avenue) the city should be able to have main roads like Bluemont Avenue cleared.

It's no wonder Manhattan streets are in such poor shape when snow removal doesn't take place expeditiously.

Days as sunny as Monday eventually melt the snow, thus making roads safer for driving. But freezing temperatures which have been occurring as of late, turn melted snow into ice at night.

City government has a responsibility to protect its citizens; a failure to clear dangerous roads is a failure to safeguard the lives of those citizens.

Other Perspectives

The majority of Americans do favor the death penalty and we all know the average American, by world standards, is not well-educated.

The state's policy should not be dictated by lynch mob mentality, especially where the sanctity of human life is concerned.

We should rise above the level of the murderer and carry out punishment with thought and reason.

Gun compromise hard to reach

Commentary

Dwayne Lively

Collegian Columnist

Bart Bryce had a big grin on his face when he walked into my room. Perched on his head was a new blue and gold cap with the insignia of the National Rifle Association on it.

"Guess what, D.L.?" Bart said.

"What?"

"I've been accepted into the NRA!"

"Oh cheer," I said. "There was much rejoicing."

"Now don't treat this lightly. This is a very important political statement I have made in the defense of the Second Amendment to the Consititution of the United States of America."

"Really?" I said.

"Really. We Nashies, as I like to refer to myself and my NRA brothers and sisters, intend to fight to the death to protect our right to keep and bear arms. If they want my gun, they're going to have to pry it from my cold, dead fingers."

"Do you Nashies hold the rest of the Constitution in such high regard?"

"Well, yeah, sort of, I guess," Bart said. "I think we do. I mean, I haven't received my Nashie handbook yet, so I don't know for certain what we think, but I'm pretty sure we support the rest of the Constitution. Guns, though, are the glue that holds the entire nation together. Without guns these precious United States would be invaded by Godless, heathen savages wearing Russkie uniforms."

"That's funny, Bart," I said. "I thought that's what we stockpiled nuclear weapons for. Deterrence."

"Well, yeah, in a way, but a nuke doesn't feel the love and loyalty I feel for my homeland. It could never defend me and mine the way I could."

"Really?"

Bart put his hands on his hips and leaned forward. I swear that he began to develop a southern accent.

"Besides," he said. "If we ban guns, only outlaws will have guns."

"Bart," I said. "What exactly does that mean?"

"It means that if you ban guns only criminals will have guns."

"What about handguns?" I continued. "What if we only ban handguns?"

"Then only outlaws will have handguns."

"But, if I may be cynical, as long as I still have my shotgun, what difference does it make? With a shotgun you only have to point in the general direction and shoot, and as long as you're close, you'll wing the criminal. A pistol has to be aimed more carefully. I hope the criminals are only carrying handguns around."

Bart shook his head. "D.L., D.L., D.L.," he said. "You're so naive. Once you ban the pistol, then they move in to take away all guns."

"They?"

"The government."

"The same government established by the Constitution you're supposed to be defending?"

"I think so," Bart said. His southern accent wavered but then came back in full. "All I know is that if you ban the pistol, next thing you know they're taking away your Swiss army knives. And the next thing you know after that, you're wearing red and kissing a babushka every evening before dinner."

"All right then," I said. "Let's say banning guns is out. What about a waiting period? Shouldn't people have to wait seven days to get a gun? After all, the person who really needs a gun right away, this very second, is planning on using it. Imagine the lives that would be saved with that simple tactic."

"Hell no!" Bart snapped. "That's the first step toward registration and that's only one step away from confiscation. That's how Hitler took power in Germany. We don't want that here! No human lives are worth that price."

"Actually, I think Hitler did a bit more than that to seize power in Germany. He was elected into office after all."

"Only after he seized the guns, I'll bet."

"Not really," I said. "But Bart, with all your 'ban this and then this will be banned' rhetoric, you're starting to sound like a member of the American Civil Liberties Union. You know, 'If you let them ban the photos of the woman and the German shepherd, the next thing you know they'll be banning the Bible.'"

"D.L.," Bart said softly. "I didn't insult you. I think you owe me an apology."

"There was no insult intended," I said. "It's just that you do sound like the ACLU, except that they defend child pornography and you defend weapons designed to maim and kill."

"The gun is a tool," Bart said. "It can do nothing without the aid of a person. Guns don't kill people, people kill people."

"I thought it was the hollow point slugs that did that."

"No, it's the people. It's the attitude of the criminal that leads to guns being used for purposes for which they were not intended."

"Let's ban attitudes then," I said. "Better yet, let's ban people. If we get rid of all the people, only guns will be left and no one will use them for criminal purposes."

"Now, D.L." Bart said. "We can't do that, that would be unconstitutional. We just can't go blow people away."

"But we can make sure they have the toys ... tools to do it?"

"That's right, the Second Amendment says 'the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.'"

"What does the first half of that amendment say?"

"There is no first half," Bart assured.

"Oh yes there is," I said. "It says 'A well regulated militia, being necesary for the existence of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.' A well regulated militia, Bart. It doesn't say every han-yock who wants a .357 magnum can rush out and buy one. It has a specific qualifier on it."

"So?" Bart countered.

"So, the Constitution says that you can own a gun if you are part of a militia. How about it, Bart? Do you love your gun enough to drag your butt out of bed at 5:30 every Saturday morning and drill with it?"

"Well, no," Bart said. "But that's forced conscription and that's unconstitutional."

"Close the window, Bart," I said. "I think there's a draft in here."

Art award received by faculty members

By Steve Logback
Collegian Reporter

Two faculty members were among six people receiving 1989 Governor's Arts Awards on Monday at the State Capitol Rotunda in Topeka.

Margo Kren, associate professor of art, and W.R. Moses, emeritus professor of English, were honored by Gov. Mike Hayden.

Kren received the award for painting due to the amount of time she has been involved in art, rather than for a particular painting.

"They want someone who has been around a while," she said.

Kren has been painting seriously for about 20 years and her emphasis is in acrylic painting. She said she is honored to have been selected as a recipient of the award.

"I'm really pleased the arts have been recognized," she said. "I accept this award for all the artists of Kansas."

Kren was awarded a National Education Association Fellowship in 1983 and has received three faculty research grants from the University. She was also one of the artists selected for "A Kansas Collection," which was displayed in April 1987 at the opening of the National Museum of Women in the Arts in Washington, D.C.

In additon, she has served as the president of the Kansas City Artists Coalition.

Kren studied at the University of Wisconsin at Madison, K-State and the University of Iowa at Iowa City, where she received a master's degree in 1979.

Moses received the Governor's Award for poetry. Recognized throughout the nation as a respected poet, he taught English at K-State from 1950 until his retirement in 1982.

Moses said he has been writing poetry for most of his life.

"(The award is) a very gratifying thing," he said.

Moses attended Vanderbilt University in Nashville, Tenn., where he received his bachelor's, master's and doctorate degrees in English.

He has published four books and his work has appeared in such publications as the Yale Review and The New Yorker.

From 1955 until 1966 he served as editor of K-State's literary publication, Kansas Quarterly, and continued as poetry editor for several years.

Congress rejects pay raise

Bush signs resolution before midnight deadline

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Congress voted overwhelmingly Tuesday to turn down its 51 percent pay raise and rushed the legislation to President Bush, who signed it hours before a midnight deadline.

Lawmakers were anxious to end the public outcry against the $45,500 increase, which left them feeling, in the words of one representative, like "cannon fodder for trash television and talk radio."

First, the House voted to reject the raise by a vote of 380-48. Less than three hours later, the Senate followed suit by a vote of 94-6.

Although Bush had supported the raise, spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said his boss "will abide by the wishes of the Congress."

The congressional votes also denied large raises for top federal executives and federal judges. Some lawmakers predicted that defeating the raises would accelerate an exodus from government service.

Indeed, Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist said in a statement:

"I deeply regret the congressional action, which has prevented the federal judges in this country from receiving a well-deserved pay raise. ... We will not be able to attract and retain the kind of judges we need ... unless we pay our judges fairly and equitably."

Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., said Bush told Senate Republicans Tuesday he might ask Congress to approve lesser raises for the judges and executives.

With its votes, Congress rejected raises proposed by a presidential commission and endorsed by then-President Reagan. Senators and representatives would have seen their salaries rise from $89,500 to $135,000.

During its less than 30 minutes of debate, the Senate heard Jesse Helms, R-N.C. and a foe of the raise, proclaim that the vote shows the American people that "you can fight city hall and you can take on the Congress of the United States with all its legerdemain and all its legislative ability."

The Senate last week voted 95-5 against the raise, but the wording of that resolution differed from the House version approved Tuesday. Sen. James Jeffords, R-Vt., who had voted against the raise, voted for it Tuesday.

Jeffords said he cast his vote Tuesday to make clear his view that judges are badly in need of a pay raise and because, unlike last week's measure, this one did not curtail lawmakers' rights to make speeches for fees.

The other senators voting to sustain the raise were Democrats Christopher Dodd of Connecticut, Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts and Spark Matsunaga of Hawaii; and Republicans Frank Murkowski of Alaska and Ted Stevens of Alaska.

Despite the overwhelming House margin, members were clearly torn between their desire for a pay raise and the public scorn heaped upon them for considering the increase.

The chamber applauded loudly when Rep. Dan Rostenkowski, D-Ill., told colleagues in a rousing speech before the vote, "Each member of this House, Democrat and Republican, is worth a salary of $135,000 a year."

The irony of the House's dilemma was reflected when Rep. Vic Fazio, D-Calif., a pay raise defender, introduced the resolution to reject the increase — but voted against the resolution.

"We face reality here today," Fazio said. "We're doing what has become inevitable."

Fazio chided his colleagues for not having "the courage to speak out" in their own defense and said, "We became cartoon cannon fodder for trash television and talk radio." He added, "There are Supreme Court justices who make less than their clerks the day after they (the clerks) retire and go into private practice."

Left dangling by Congress' action were ethics reforms that lawmakers had hoped to pass once the raise became law.

These included a ban on fees for speeches and appearances in both houses. A bipartisan House negotiating group also had agreed to do away in 1991 with a legal loophole that allowed 190 House members — those in office before 1980 — to accumulate $39 million in leftover campaign cash, which can be converted to personal use.

The Miller Tract scored the highest number of points possible in five of the 10 criteria — potential for integration with existing recreation amenitites, potential for integration into the overall economic development strategy, potential for integration with quality residential development, visibility and location within the community and attractiveness of natural environmental setting.

The site with the second-highest ranking is located north of the intersection of Kimball Avenue and Seth Child's Road. This site was ranked by the study with the highest possible number of points for its relationship with existing urban development and municipal services, as well as relative cost effectiveness of extending infrastruture to the site.

The Freilich study states the consortium's "intent is to create a market which does not exist in the Manhattan/Riley County area by establishing a unique product ..."

If financed, the park will be marketed to the Kansas City area, Boyd said.

"In this project we are attracting both population and employers," Boyd said. "It's unusual to attract population to Kansas — and we want a population with money."

Consortium members believe that the multi-purpose park will take on the overflow from Manhattan's main industrial area — the Manhattan Industrial Park — which is about 120 acres in size.

Muir said even though plans for the Miller Tract fell through, the consortium will stay together.

"There has been a dedication made from within (the members of the board) that the concept is a good one and that we will stay together no matter what happens," Muir said.

"This project is a change in direction for the better of Manhattan," Boyd said. "If we don't do this, then we're not taking advantage of what we have in this community."

He said he believes the public's "enthusiasm" for the proposed park has led the community to believe the planning is further along than it is.

"Public enthusiasm, which is good, has gotten the project further along, in the public's view, than we are. Now, they're just anxious to see some results and the results are very difficult to see," Boyd said.

Because the consortium's name has become synonymous with the Miller Tract proposal, Muir said the consortium's name will be changed.

Muir said he believes the consortium's options have expanded due to the failure to sign a contract with the owners of the Miller Tract.

"About 80 percent of what we have done is in general terms. The other 20 percent is site specific. So if we can keep that 20 percent, then we'll be doing good," he said.

Boyd said outside pressures are pushing for the park to be financed within three years.

"There is pressure to get this done in three years, because that's when we are going to need it. By that time, Manhattan will be out of industrial space and residential areas for upper-middle and upper class housing," he said.

Within the past year, Boyd said he has had "serious" negotiations with 33 businesses interested in relocating to Manhattan.

"However, more than half of those have already been lost to Manhattan because we didn't have the quality of facilities that they were looking for," he said.

Had the multi-purpose park been in place, Boyd said, Manhattan could have competed with other cities.

Businesses are interested in relocating to smaller, university communities with research capabilities, he said.

"The secret to all of this is KSU. Without K-State this can't work. We need both the cultural aspect and the research capabilities."

— Bill Boyd
President, Chamber of Commerce

"You'll find that businesses will not relocate into areas that have had a strike within the last five years. That's what is killing Kansas City," Boyd said.

Because of low labor costs and high productivity levels at Manhattan businesses, the city could be considered competitive with areas such as Corporate Woods in Overland Park, Boyd said.

An obstacle in attracting employers to Manhattan is the limited pool of possible employees.

"Our main problem is that we don't have a large labor pool. We don't have 300 unemployed electricians, plumbers or whatever," Boyd said. "This slows us down because we have to train individuals or find them in other communities."

One change that could help in that area, Boyd said, is the $6 million Job Corp Training Center, which was approved Sept. 20. This center will train about 300 people each year with vocational skills.

Not expected to open for at least two years, the center has had monetary commitments from the state and federal governments, said J.R. Pierson, assistant city manager.

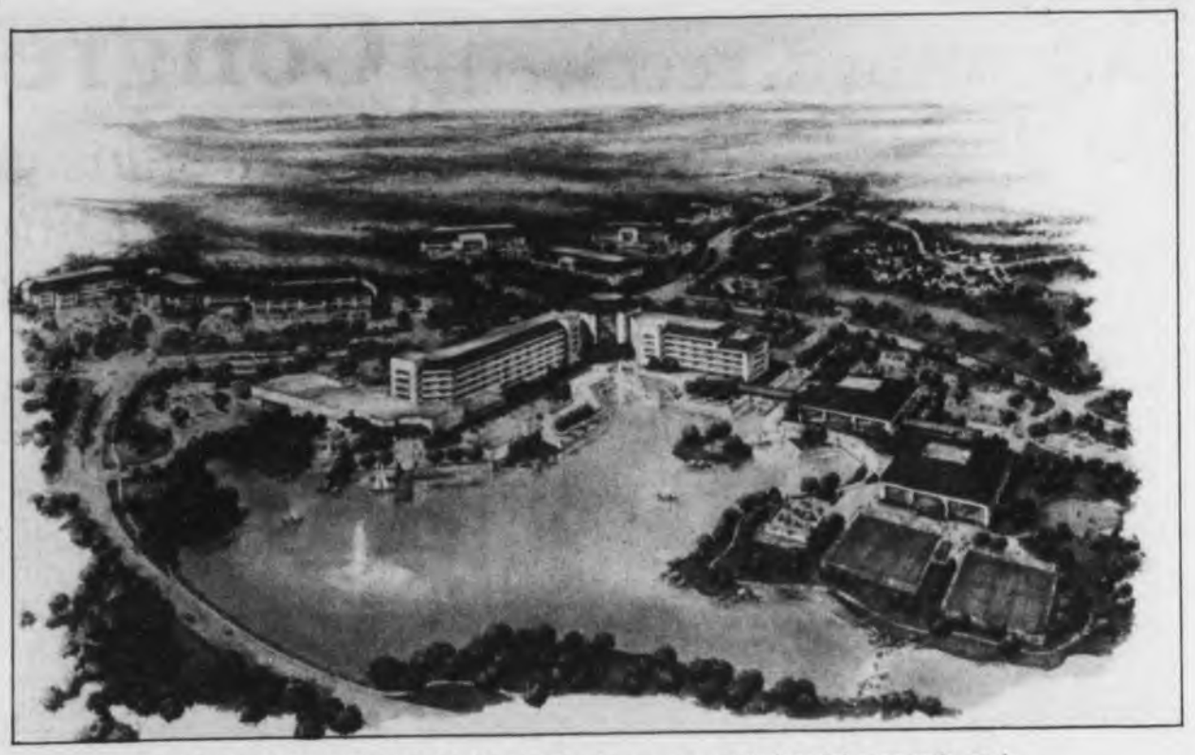
"Whenever you have a major project of the size and scale of this one, it takes about three to five years in planning before you can ever break ground," Boyd said.

"The secret to all of this is KSU. Without K-State this can't work. We need both the cultural aspect and the research capabilities," he said.

In order for the proposal to work, state support must be received, Boyd said.

"We think, at this point, that there must be a feasible plan between all parties," he said. "I think the support will be there more later than now, because in a few years, more of them will be having more experience in dealing with projects like this."

State support, Boyd said, could be received three different ways.



As much as $300,000 could be given to the proposal by KTEC to fund planning and marketing.

"We have to have something to take to them before we know how much we can get. They have an ongoing board of directors, so this money can be gotten immediately," Boyd said.

Another alternative, he said, is for the state to fund a special project, such as a new center for research. These funds would have to be approved through the State Legislature and would take an unknown amount of time before they could be received.

"In addition, the state could help with the setting-up of financing to assist the development of clients," Boyd said. "This could mean helping to attract businesses to here from other states through tax packages or whatever.

"All three of these plans will probably be used at some point of the development, it's just a matter of when is the right time to use them," he said.

An artist's rendering of The Bluemont Consortium's proposed industrial-research park.

The Freilich report states that a tract can be acquired by the consortium in four ways:

- an exchange for a limited partnership interest;
- a purchase for cash of the entire tract;
- a series of long-term options;
- a ground lease of the entire tract with the owner as landlord and the consortium as tenant with options to purchase individual tracts during the term of the lease.

The last alternative, Boyd said, is the most likely.

"I'd be very surprised if it comes down to the consortium owning the whole thing at one time," he said.

Once the land is brought under one owner, Boyd said he expects it to take less than a year to gain public approval from all necessary agencies.

Those agencies include the city and county planning commissions, the Board of Education, the Riley County law board and the Manhattan Municipal Airport.

In a 1977, 20-year plan for the city's growth, the areas northeast and northwest of Manhattan were established as the higher priority areas. The areas southeast and southwest were listed as lower priority.

Pierson said the priorities for the city's growth have changed.

"Right now, the southwest is top priority," Pierson said. "It was planned to be a residential area and since they (the consortium members) are planning a mixed-use park, it should work well.

"That plan is just what people thought 10 years ago. They aren't set in stone. I guess the question is just whether the needs of the community are changing or not," he said.

Debate turns into partisan battle

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A House committee's debate on reapportionment Tuesday turned into a partisan battle over a special state census that will provide population figures for redistricting.

As they have throughout the debate, Democratic members of the Legislative, Judicial and Congressional Apportionment Committee questioned the accuracy of a 1988 census conducted by the secretary of state's office.

Democrats continued to raise concerns about the procedures used to conduct the census. The most vocal complaints come from minority party members who represent districts said to have fewer people than they should.

Committee Chairman Vince Snowbarger, R-Olathe, defended the use of the state census figures and accused the Democrats of attempting to delay redistricting for political purposes.

The arguments flared again because the committee was putting together a set of guidelines that included a rule that said the census figures would be the basis for reapportionment. Democratic attempts to change the rule failed on a series of party-line votes.

Subcommittees assigned to redraw districts in certain areas of the state are supposed to use the guidelines in their work. Snowbarger has said he hopes to see the first subcommittee plans next week.

"It's a major decision on our part to accept those figures and draw districts based on them," said Rep. Joan Adam, D-Atchison.

Flex for Fitness

Regular workouts make fine physiques

Working out on the weekends means more to some students than repeatedly lifting a 12-ounce glass. Class and work schedules, never-ending errands and last-minute crises can seriously cut into weekday workouts, leaving only the weekends for exercising.

Falling prey to the weekend-only workout can leave an individual feeling sore and tired on Monday morning. Although some muscle soreness is expected after a weekend of heavy exercising, it should be taken as a warning sign if it continues until Tuesday or Wednesday, said Carl Cramer, a trainer for the KSU Athletic Department.

"It's a warning that you've done more than you're ready for," Cramer said. "You should gauge yourself so the same thing doesn't happen again."

Other problems weekend warriors may experience include soreness in the joints,

"It's a priority that you set. ... You wouldn't skip dinner, so you don't skip your workout."
—Chrissy Vendel
freshman in arts and sciences and ankle, knee and hip pain that is associated with "running too far, too soon," he said.

Weekend warriors "cannot become fit, neither in cardiovascular skills nor in the skills of the sport (which they play only on the weekend)," said Dr. Guy Smith, director of Eriksen Sportsmedicine Clinic at Lafene Student Health Center.

Besides not being able to increase their fitness level, those who exercise only on the weekends can't adapt to the workout, Smith said.

"By the time you get back to it, all the muscle strength has left," he said.

Smith said Monday is the busiest day at the sports medicine clinic. Although he said he assumes some of the patient increase is do to the clinic not being open over the weekend, he said many of the injured are those who "just play on the weekends."

Exercising regularly during the week is better on the body than overworking on the weekends, Cramer said. One way to fit daily exercise into a busy schedule is to decrease the length of time of the workout and exercise more frequently.

To produce any results from exercising, one needs to work out more than two times a week for a minumum of 20 minutes, Smith said.

"You need to be doing (cardiovascular fitness) three to four times per week to achieve any results," he said.

Lisa Scott, sophomore in elementary education, said she tries to exercise one hour per day, six days per week. She divides her workout time between aerobics and jogging. Twice a week she attends the 6:30 a.m. aerobics session at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Working out is a "stress-reliever," Scott said.

"I make time each day (to exercise). There is always something else I could be doing, but I wouldn't feel as good," she said.

Scott said her weekend workouts are usually of the same intensity or even a little less challenging than her weekday ones.

Chrissy Vendel, freshman in arts and sciences, said she started working out in the fall because she didn't want to gain weight. But Vendel, who runs six miles a day, seven days a week, said now it's a daily routine she can't do without.

"It's a priority that you set. ... You wouldn't skip dinner, so you don't skip your workout," she said. "You don't make time — it's just there. ... Maybe some days you don't watch TV."

Mike Brewer, sophomore in premedicine, exercises daily for 1½ hours in a routine that rotates every four days. He spends 90 percent of his workout lifting weights and the other 10 percent in aerobic exercise, such as jumping rope or playing basketball.

Because his routine rotates, Brewer said the weekends don't change its intensity. "I've always been into it ever since high school," he said. "I liked it; it made me feel good. ... I kind of became obsessed (with it)."

Limiting workouts to the weekends may satisfy people who are only interested in maintaining their physical appearance, but it won't do much for those who want to improve their present shape, Cramer said.

"If you want to get into better shape, (weekend workouts) are not enough," he said.

While some people can make time for exercise during the week by juggling schedules or rising and shining 30 minutes earlier, others have no choice but to reserve the weekends for their workouts.

Cramer gives the same advice to weekend warriors as he received from Arnold Schwarzenegger in the late 1970s when he had the chance to question the bodybuilder-actor about weekend workouts.

"If that's all the time you have — it's better than nothing," he said.

Smith agreed.

"Any sort of exercise is of some benefit," he said.

The weekend warrior who participates in agressive group sports instead of recreational activities increases the chances of getting injured, Cramer said. Walking, golf, tennis, bowling and recreational basketball are good activities for the weekend-only exerciser.

Grant establishes food safety consortium

By Joe Kennedy
Collegian Reporter

The College of Agriculture has received $1.4 million in federal funds to be shared with the University of Arkansas and Iowa State University for a consortium on food safety.

The consortium is an activity initiated by the University of Arkansas in response to the growing concern for food safety in the food system, said Kurt Feltner, associate director of the College of Agriculture.

Under the USDA proposal, the University of Arkansas will study safety factors of poultry, Iowa State will study pork and K-State will study beef.

The scientists will not work exclusively in these areas, but their efforts will concentrate in these areas, Feltner said.

The research to be done will be separated into several different areas which are still in preliminary stages, waiting for approval, he said.

"Part of the work would build upon ongoing programs for rapid methods of detecting food safety problems," Feltner said.

Other parts of the program would include identifying the degree of importance of various contaminants, as well as looking at red meat processing and packaging as it influences food safety and shelf life, he said.

The college doesn't exactly know its share of the funds appropriated for the project, said Walter Woods, dean of the College of Agriculture. It is waiting for negotiations to decide the best way to allocate the funds to create the strongest consortium on food safety.

In an article from the February issue of The Chronicle of Higher Education, the funding was listed as an example of "pork barrel science."

Pork barrel legislation is the allocation of funds earmarked by the influence of senators and representatives, said William Richter, head of the political science department.

"It's the sort of issue that depends on whether you are winning or losing," Richter said. "If funds are going elsewhere, it's pork barrel. If the funds go to the place wanted, it's good legislation."

Funding was provided by Congress for other projects at the College of Agriculture as well.

Studying insects that attack stored grains is a project for which the college received $285,000.

"You have to think of Kansas in terms of being a grain exporting state," Feltner said.

The grains being stored are mainly wheat, grain sorghum and soy beans, he said. Food and feed grains are being stored at different time intervals and insects can influence the quality of the grain.

The agriculture department also provided $100,000 to the college for genetic wheat research. This program is being implemented, Woods said.

"The Board of Regents, in 1984, approved the establishment of a wheat genetics resource center," Feltner said. "This funding has been needed so fundamental work can be conducted such as plant breeding, genetic engineering, chromosome mapping, tissue cultures and recombinant DNA technology."

The Wheat Genetics Resource Center has a vast collection of wild wheat, Feltner said. The wild wheat has genes that help it survive harsh weather conditions. The center is involved with incorporating the genes of the wild wheat into domestic wheat.

International livestock is another program that received funding. It received $95,000 to help expand and develop the market of livestock and livestock products overseas, said Jack Riley, head of the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry.

Through courses, the international livestock program makes contact with people who could help long-term international development of markets, Riley said.

"A lot of products go to Mexico and students come from Mexico to go through the courses.

"The program puts people in the position to build their own livestock programs," he said. "We work with developing countries and work with upgrading their standard of living."

The college also received about $1.3 million for the planning to construct a plant science center, Feltner said. The plans will consist of the completion of glass houses for Plant Science Phase II, which will be an addition to Throckmorton Hall.

PARSONS
SCHOOL OF DESIGN
Special Summer Programs

Parsons in Paris June 30-August 14
Paint on the Left Bank, explore prehistoric caves in the Dordogne, visit the masterpieces of renaissance art in Tuscany. Courses include painting, drawing, art history and the liberal arts. Students may choose to spend the last two weeks of the program in the Dordogne or Cortona, Italy.

Photography in Paris June 30-July 31
Study both the aesthetics and the craft of photography in the city that has inspired great photographers for 150 years. Guest lecturers and visits to Parisian galleries supplement the curriculum.

Fashion in Paris June 30-July 31
Study the history and contemporary trends of French fashion design through visits to Parisian museums and costume collections. Guest lecturers and visits to design studios and retail outlets are part of the program, as are daily classes in fashion illustration.

History of Architecture and Decorative Arts in Paris June 30-July 31
Offered in collaboration with the renowned Museé des Arts Décoratifs, this program focuses on the history of French architecture and European decorative arts. Excursions to points outside of Paris are included; last summer, students visited Versailles, Vaux le Vicomte and Fontainebleau.

Modern Paris June 30-July 31
Combining architectural history with drawing, this program focuses on the development of Paris in the modern period (1830 to the present).

Paleolithic Art and Archaeology of the Dordogne July 30-August 13
Daily class sessions near the town of Les Eyzies de Tayac, in southwestern France, are devoted to lectures and guided visits to the areas famous and less well-known prehistoric caves, living sites, and archaeological excavations.

History of Architecture in Italy June 29-July 28
The architectural heritage of Italy is studied in Rome, Florence and Venice, where on-site presentations are made by Parsons faculty.

History of Architecture and Decorative Arts in Great Britain July 6-August 7
This four-week curriculum, covering the years 1600-1900, is offered in London, with several excursions to nearby towns and country houses.

Graphic Design in Japan July 10-August 10
Design students and professionals will discover the excitement of Japanese advertising and graphic design through workshops, seminars and presentations by internationally known designers. Studio, museum and gallery visits supplement the curriculum, which emphasizes the sources, in the traditional arts, of much contemporary Japanese design.

Parsons in Israel July 22-August 18
Offered in collaboration with Jerusalem's Bezalel Academy of Arts and Design, the program provides an in-depth introduction to major sites of historical importance, to the rudiments of archaeological practice and to techniques of artistic representation.

Parsons in West Africa July 8-August 2 and August 5-26
Workshops in ceramics and fibers will introduce students to artists and artisans in several Ivory Coast villages, where these crafts can be studied in their original context. A photography curriculum examines techniques of documentation and reportage in regions of great natural beauty and cultural diversity. The history of African art and architecture also is offered. Additional study in Mali may be taken as a separate option, or as a continuation of the Ivory Coast program.

All programs include round trip airfare, accommodations and land transfers. Academic credit is available to qualified students. For more information, please return the coupon or call

Lady Cats eye sixth straight win

Iowa State looks to avenge defeat

By Mike Rouse
Collegian Reporter

The K-State women's basketball team will be looking to extend its five-game winning streak at 7 tonight at Iowa State where the Lady Cats will hook up with the Lady Cyclones in a Big Eight Conference contest at Hilton Coliseum in Ames.

The Lady Cats, 16-5 overall and 6-2 in the Big Eight, have not lost since an 82-75 defeat Jan. 18 at Missouri. They were able to avenge that loss Saturday as they crushed the Lady Tigers, 97-78.

In the first meeting of the season between Iowa State and K-State, the Lady Cats shot 52 percent from the field and were able to pull out an 87-76 win in Bramlage Coliseum. K-State also made 27 more free throws than Iowa State, the difference in the game.

Iowa State, 12-9 overall and 3-5 in the Big Eight, is coming off a 76-60 loss to Colorado last weekend. The Lady Cyclones have lost six of their last eight games after jumping out to a 10-4 start.

A win over Iowa State would be the first time K-State has beaten a team twice in the same season since 1986-87, when K-State downed three teams twice in conference play.

"This is a chance to beat a team twice for the first time all year," K-State coach Matilda Mossman said. "Iowa State is a very noteworthy opponent."

Mossman's biggest concern is the amount of offensive rebounding her team has done this season. The Lady Cats have been outrebounded on the offensive side by almost 2½ rebounds per game in conference play.

One of the offensive highlights for the Lady Cats against Missouri was the play of Stephanie Lane. She scored a career-high 15 points and grabbed five rebounds.

"What Stephanie did was a culmination of a series of things .... The question is can she do it again," Mossman said.

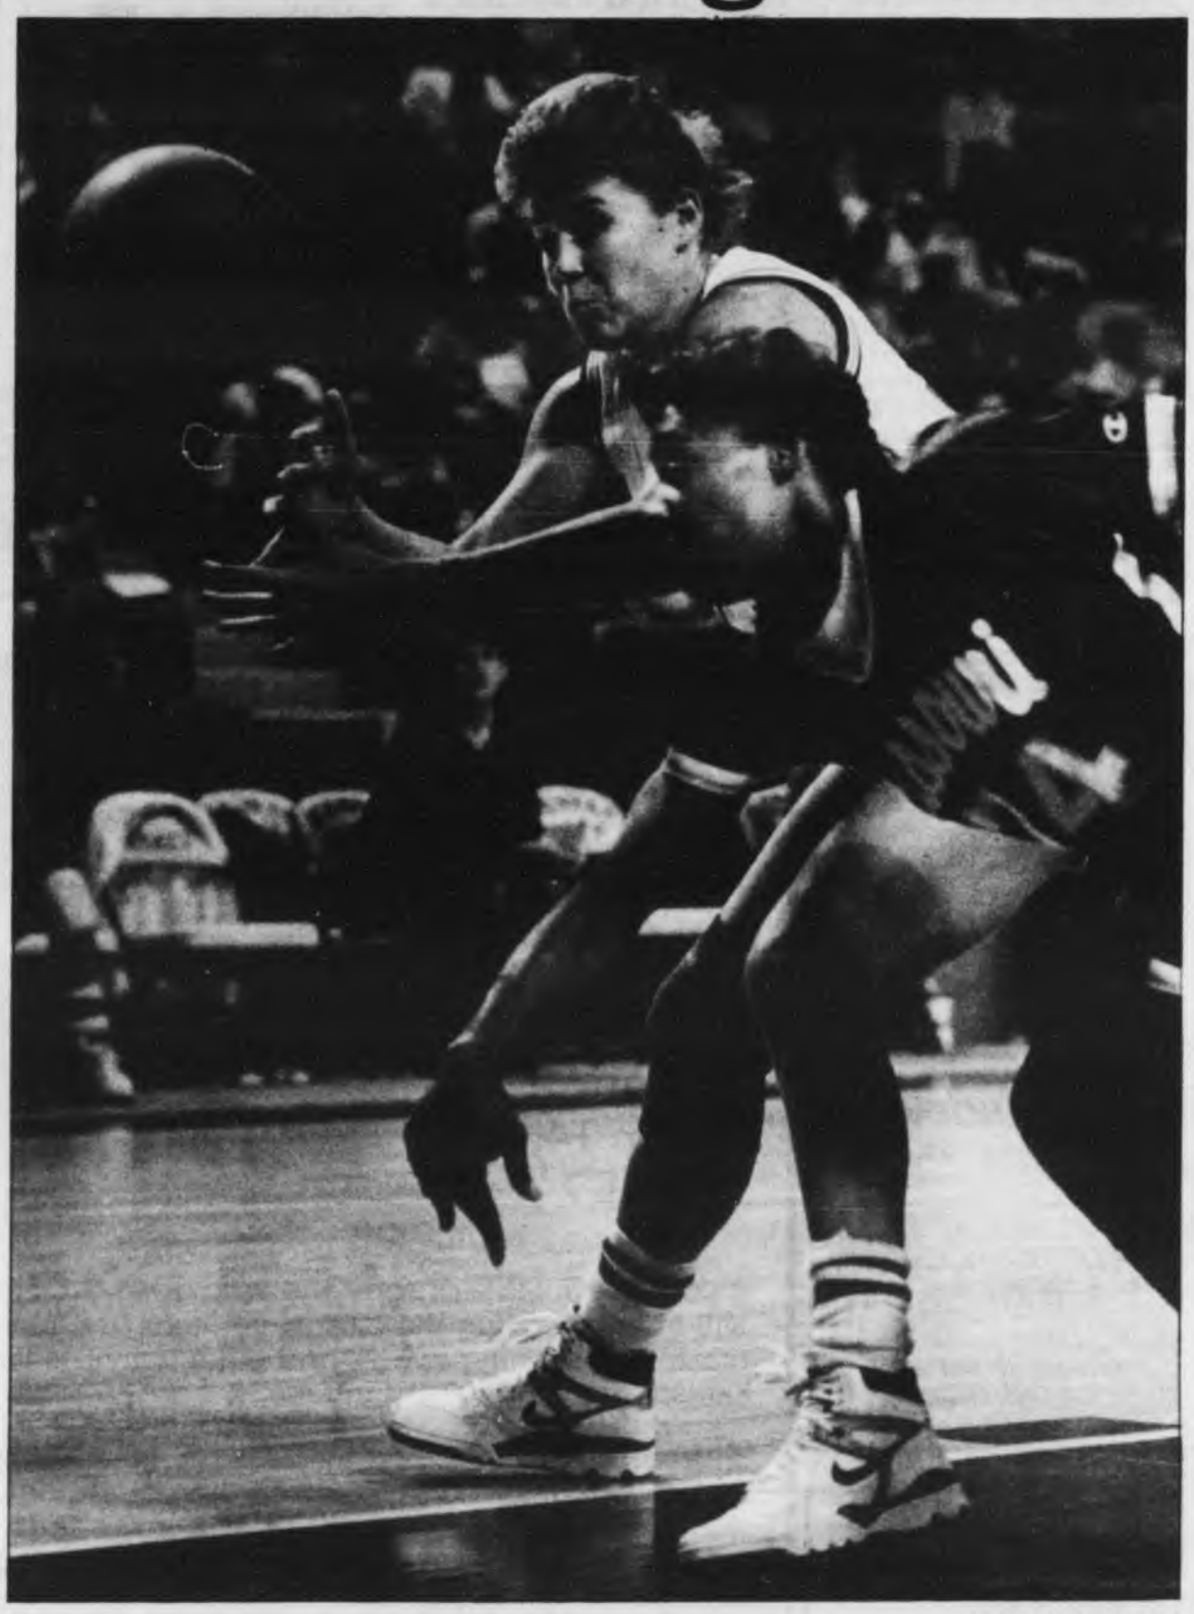
K-State's offense continues to show a balanced attack with four Lady Cat starters averaging in double figures. Nadira Hazim is the Lady Cats leading scorer, averaging 14.2 points a game.

Forward Diana Miller is averaging 12.4 points a game and is the team's leading rebounder, averaging seven. Kristie Bahner is averaging 11.5 points and freshman Mary Jo Miller

"This is a chance to beat a team twice for the first time all year."
—Matilda Mossman, Lady Cats' coach

10. The Lady Cats' fifth starter, Rita Matteucci, is averaging 9.1 points a game, but in Big Eight action she, too, is averaging in double figures at 11.3.

Iowa State's starting lineup has no player under 5-foot-8. The Lady Cyclones' tallest player is 6-foot-3 Carmen Jaspers. She is also Iowa State's leading scorer at 12.2 points a game.



"They are a very big team with only one player under six foot," she said. "We would like to run a little bit against them."

Last year, Iowa State was the only team that the Lady Cats were able to pick up a win against in conference play, defeating the Lady Cyclones, 83-70, in Ahearn Field House.

From Ames, the Lady Cats' schedule gets no easier. K-State travels for a 7:30 p.m. Saturday contest at Nebraska, then it's off to Colorado to meet the conference-leading Lady Buffs at 6:05 p.m. Wednesday.

Probable Starters

Lady Cats (16-5)	Pos.	Iowa State (12-9)
Bahner(5-11, So.)	F	Greiner(6-2, Sr.)
D.Miller(5-10, So.)	F	Coyle(6-1, Jr.)
Matteucci(5-11, Jr.)	C	Jaspers(6-3, Sr.)
Hazim(5-7, So.)	G	Horvath(5-8, Sr.)
M.Miller(5-5, Fr.)	G	Ward(6-1, Jr.)

Forward Diana Miller and the Lady Cats travel to Ames, Iowa, tonight in hopes of extending their five-game winning streak against the Lady Cyclones. K-State's last victory was Saturday against Missouri.

Recruits can sign today

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

Today marks the first day that K-State football coach Bill Snyder will finally find out what kind of salesman he has been in his efforts to lure the region's top high school recruits to K-State.

Beginning today, prospective high school recruits can sign letters stating their intentions as to where they will play football during the next four years.

K-State has 18 scholarships available and Snyder expects to fill them all.

Among the area recruits Snyder seems to have landed is 6-foot-2, 270-pound Steve Moten of Topeka-Seaman High School. Moten was named all-state offensive and defensive tackle this past season and was leaning toward Kansas before meeting with Snyder. Now he looks to be heading for Manhattan next fall.

Four other Kansas products have reportedly committed orally to K-State. Another offensive and defensive tackle, Dave Haresnape, 6-foot-3, 225, from Smith Center, and tight end Brad Seib, 6-foot-3, 210, from Hoisington, are expected to sign with the Wildcats today.

Riley County standouts Don Hilliard, a 6-foot, 220-pound running back, and Brett Weis, a 6-foot-1, 230-pound lineman, have made clear their intentions to walk-on at K-State next year. Hilliard ran for 3,786 career yards at Riley and most of his holes were opened by Weis.

College coaches are prohibited from discussing recruits, so Snyder was unable to comment on K-State's reported commitments.

The following is a list of other prospects who have at least listed K-State as one of their final choices:

Kevin Pointer, WR-RB, Kansas City (Mo.) Sumner Academy
Nati Valdez, WR, Mission (Texas)
Lance Marburger, QB, Edinburg (Texas)
Ricky Bailey, OL-DL, Edinburg (Texas)
Leo Araguz, K, Harlingen (Texas)
James Locke, OT, San Antonio (Texas) Churchill
Marcus Moss, RB, San Antonio (Texas) Madison
Kino Johnson, LB-DE, East St. Louis (Mo.)
Scott Wynn, RB, Hillsboro (Mo.)
Reggie Blackwell, LB, Ritenour (Mo.)
Phillip Shieldes, RB-DB, St. Louis (Mo.) Vashon
Corey Johnson, RB, St. Louis (Mo.) Sumner
Tony Williams, OT, St. Louis (Mo.) Riverview Garden

NCAA studies reports of violations by MU

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The NCAA is studying newspaper reports of wrongdoing in the Missouri basketball program but not yet conducting a probe of its own, enforcement chief David Berst said.

"I'm sure we'll be in communication with the school," Berst told the Associated Press Tuesday. "But at this point we're simply standing by and will review the information they develop."

In Tuesday's editions, the Kansas City Times said a tape recording of a conversation between assistant coach Bob Sundvold and the mother of a former player allegedly reveals the school bought airline tickets so the player could go home and return to campus. The Times also said the former player, P.J. Mays of Cincinnati, told Missouri athletic department officials in a taped conversation that he and two other players each got $100 in cash from Sundvold.

Both would be violations of NCAA legislation.

Missouri officials refused to return calls Tuesday but Chancellor Haskell Monroe issued a statement saying a special meeting of the Intercollegiate Committee would be held Wednesday.

"The alleged violations in the basketball program concern me deeply because Missouri has taken justifiable pride in the integrity of its athletic programs," Monroe said in the statement. "I have instructed the athletic director to make recommendations to me regarding necessary actions we will take to protect this integrity."

Monroe's statement said the university "first became aware of the alleged ticket purchase in late December."

"Faculty representative Carl Settergren reported the incident informally to the NCAA at its annual convention in early January, and we have been conducting an internal investigation since then. Athletic director Dick Tamburo has kept me informed of the findings, and we met again this morning to discuss his progress.

"We reviewed additional information brought forth in a meeting Sunday between Mr. Tamburo, Dr. Settergren, P.J. Mays and his mother, Yvonne Mays, including those allegations brought forth by the media. Mr. Tamburo and Dr. Settergren will discuss these findings and allegations in a special meeting of the intercollegiate athletic committee on Wednesday. I will comment further when I receive a complete report from the athletic director."

KU still looking for No. 1,400

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — If this keeps up, Kansas may not be the third school after all to reach 1,400 victories.

Two weeks ago, the Jayhawks needed just one more victory to join Kentucky and North Carolina in the 1,400-victory club. As word spread of their imminent leap over this arbitrary statistical summit, Kansas grads all over the map took note. A little positive reinforcement was just what the doctor ordered for fans depressed over the three-year probation the NCAA handed down in November.

"We heard from alumni from just about everywhere you can imagine," said Jeff Bollig of the Kansas athletic department.

But hold those messages of congratulations. Since pocketing victory No. 1,399, Kansas has offered Kansas State, Missouri and Nebraska the honor of being historic victim No. 1,400. But the champagne remains on ice, unopened.

"We're playing scared right now," senior forward Milt Newton said after the loss to Nebraska. "I don't know where it went, but our confidence is gone."

Nothing would restore that confidence like a 1,400th all-time victory. And Wednesday night at 8:05 p.m. in Allen Fieldhouse, the Jayhawks will make one more stab at it. But the opposition will be a young and dangerous Oklahoma State team — the same bunch who pulled off the 77-73 upset of then-No. 1 Oklahoma in their previous game.

Top prospects leaning to Irish

By The Associated Press

Notre Dame, coming off its first national football championship in 11 years, is about to score another dramatic victory.

Wednesday is the national signing day for high school prospects and the Irish loom as runaway winners, according to Allen Wallace, publisher of SuperPrep Magazine of Costa Mesa, Calif.

Notre Dame has received oral commitments from 17 of the 161 players given All-America status by SuperPrep, including the top-rated prospects in two of the magazine's nine categories — quarterback Rick Mirer of Goshen, Ind., and tight end Irv Smith of Pemberton, N.J.

Mirer was SuperPrep's No. 1-rated quarterback, as well as Midwest Offensive Player of the Year. He led his team to the state championship by completing 259 of 420 passes for 3,973 yards and 30 touchdowns while rushing for 480 yards and 22 TDs. He played safety on defense, intercepting eight passes, and also did the placekicking.

The 6-foot-4, 230-pound Smith is rated the best tight end in the country although his team's wishbone offense limited him to 18 receptions.

He made All-State as a defensive back.

SuperPrep's top-rated offensive lineman, 275-pound Bob Whitfield of Wilmington, Calif., has committed to Stanford, as has the top kicker, Paul Stonehouse of Los Angeles. The No. 1 defensive lineman, 268-pound Sean Gilbert of Aliquippa, Pa., Defensive Player of the Year in the Northeast, says he will attend Pitt. The No. 1 defensive back, Eric Geter of Newnan, Ga., is headed for Clemson.

Take note, Barry: Staying in school remains logical choice

This is an open letter to Heisman Trophy-winning tailback Barry Sanders of Oklahoma State University in Stillwater, Okla.

Dear Barry:

I've been reading and listening with much interest about your possible decision to leave OSU and enter the professional ranks.

The Dallas Morning News ignited the fire by running a story on Sunday saying that you had told a National Football League team you definitely would turn professional. You also gave no clear indication in an Associated Press story as to what your decision would be.

Adding further fuel to the speculation have been statements by your father, William, who said he didn't believe you had anything to gain by staying in school and, if asked, would advise you to leave Oklahoma State for a professional career.

"What I meant to say to (the AP) was 'no comment,'" Sanders said in Tuesday's issue of The Wichita Eagle-Beacon. You also said the Dallas news story was "pure speculation."

You have until April 10 to apply for the NFL's supplemental draft, and at a news conference Jan. 6 in Wichita, you said you would "most likely" return to OSU, adding that

Mid-Week Commentary

TOM MORRIS
Sports Columnist

"between now and March a lot could happen."

You set national records last season by rushing for 2,628 yards and scoring 39 touchdowns. Yes, it's true that you would be a high pick in the draft and would become a wealthy man.

Money isn't everything, though. Stay in school, Barry. Here's a few reasons why.

First, you will become only the second player in NCAA history to win the Heisman Trophy twice. Ohio State's Archie Griffin was the other. With all the credibility problems the Big Eight Conference has suffered as of late, a two-time Heisman winner in the league could do nothing but help.

The lack of television exposure due to the Cowboys' NCAA probation will not hurt your image. You were on national television just twice last season, and you won college football's highest honor in a city that isn't even close to being a media hotbed. Your feats were self-made, not a media creation, which is the biggest accomplishment of all.

You've been one to avoid the spotlight when possible — even going so far as to making a less-than-enthusiastic appearance when accepting the Heisman. If you think it's bad now, wait until you enter the professional ranks. Staying your senior year at OSU could only help you adjust to the media blitz you're sure to receive in the NFL.

There are other factors to consider and this is where your father is wrong.

If you enter the pros without a degree, what happens after your NFL career is finished? The fact that you won't be in the limelight anymore shouldn't be a factor, and you should leave a wealthy man.

But do you have the educational and interpersonal skills to adjust to a more contemporary business lifestyle? And how will you leave the professional ranks? Will it be a long and shining career or will it end abruptly?

These are just some things any of the select few athletes fortunate enough to be of professional caliber should consider.

Sincerely, a fan.

Rushes participate in sorority activities

By The Collegian Staff

Women wanting to get a taste of greek life will now have a chance — sorority spring open rush began Sunday and will continue until Feb. 20.

"Open rush is very informal, with each house being able to set up its own rush parties, times of the parties and the locations," said Barb Robel, Greek Affairs adviser.

Twelve women are going through spring rush after a record number of 573 women pledged sororities during fall rush in 1987, followed by 571 last fall.

The three sororities participating this semester are Alpha Gamma Delta, Kappa Delta and Sigma Sigma Sigma. The remaining nine sororities pledged capacity during the fall rush, Robel said.

Informal activities include dinner at the house or a regular party, she said. The sorority calls the girls on the phone and invites them to their function.

"We rush girls as you regularly would, but on a more casual basis," said Melissa Peel, junior in management and rush director for Tri-Sigma.

"Panhellenic tells the girls that they will have at least three contacts from each house that is interested in them," Peel said.

Tri-Sigma will have at least three parties, with their first party Thursday.

"Our sorority held its first rush party Monday night," said Sonya Schraeder, president-elect of Alpha Gamma Delta and senior in accounting.

"The party was called K-State Night where our members wore purple and white," Schraeder said. "We also presented a skit and a slide show."

Kappa Delta had a scavenger hunt for its first party Tuesday night, said Sharon Pettijohn, membership chairwomam and sophomore in elementary education.

The KD's are conducting spring rush similar to formal rush, with the second party including a house tour and the third and final parties including formal dinner, Pettijohn said.

Twelve women is not an unusual number to go through spring rush, she said.

Robel said she hoped recent probations given to the Beta Theta Pi fraternity and Alpha Delta Pi sorority for violations of the hazing policy would not affect interest in greek life.

Center to aid in rehabilitation, conservation of Kansas wildlife

By Darren Keller
Collegian Reporter

The University has the ideal setting for a state wildlife rehabilitation center, according to Terry Campbell, assistant professor of surgery and medicine.

Campbell spoke at the charter meeting for a Kansas Wildlife Rehabilitation Center Tuesday night in Frick Auditorium.

"An area outside of Manhattan will be an excellent location (for the center) because of the facilities we have right next door in the (veterinary medicine) school," he said.

Project Release is the name of the effort which would establish a rehabilitation center to aid in the recovery of injured wildlife.

The project's two goals are long-term convalescence of wildlife and education about wildlife conservation.

The center will serve as a location for people to bring injured or orphaned wildlife. By offering these services, people will not feel as though they have to treat the animal on their own, said Teresa Bradley, education chairperson for the project board and junior in veterinary medicine.

If the center is completed, the injured or orphaned animals will be treated at the College of Veterinary Medicine and transported by volunteers to a secluded area outside of Manhattan to start rehabilitation in a natural setting, Campbell said.

"It is going to be so much better to have this natural setting. The animals often get very lethargic and stop eating after lengthy periods indoors because of human presence, fluorescent lights and possible predators barking and howling in cages next door," he said.

However, the center needs community and monetary support to start the construction of flight cages for birds of prey and holding facilities for other wildlife.

Additional education of veterinary medicine students, faculty and the general public through the center will add to the expense.

One purpose of the center is to teach wildlife conservation and help "change attitudes to caring attitudes" about wildlife in general, Bradley said.

"Hands-on experience is the best way to teach wildlife conservation," Bradley said. "We hope to have an educational satellite (facility) that we can run tours through to promote wildlife education."

Ice reduces river's flow

By The Associated Press

ST. JOSEPH, Mo. — An ice bridge across the Missouri River in Nebraska sharply reduced the flow of drinking water at St. Joseph on Tuesday, prompting Gov. John Ashcroft to send the Missouri National Guard to the city.

Ashcroft said the National Guard would provide air transportation for a large emergency pump to increase the pumping capacity of the Missouri-American Water Co. by 7 million to 8 million gallons per day.

The governor said the National Guard would fly a C-130 air transport to the Chicago area to pick up the pump and return it to St. Joseph. The guard would also would be available to assist the community, Ashcroft said.

The pump was expected to arrive in St. Joseph late Tuesday night and be in operation by this morning, he said.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers said the ice bridge broke Monday night, freeing an increased flow of water that should reach St. Joseph by this afternoon or evening.

"The ice bridge apparently formed over the weekend ... It has since broken. The water level has risen at Omaha about five feet from what it was during the jam, and that higher level is moving on down the river. We are thinking it will reach the point at St. Joseph where they can start pumping normally" by this evening, said Larry Crump, of the Corps of Engineers in Kansas City.

"(Trotter) set the fund up himself as a personal fund," Noordsy said. "It was set up with a future, but (the future) was not decided."

The purpose of the fund was not designated at the time, Noordsy said.

The family will designate how they want the funds used.

Trotter is survived by his wife, Marilyn, and two sons, Steven and Don Jr.

The funeral will be a private family service, said Douglas Meloan of Edwards-Yorgensen-Meloan Funeral Home.

Reactions varied

Banks don't want higher federal insurance rates

By Craig Hamrick
Collegian Reporter

Reaction from spokesmen for local banking institutions was mixed following President George Bush's announcement Monday of bailout plans for the savings and loan industry.

The plan includes higher federal insurance premiums for banks as well as savings and loans.

Charlie Hostetler, chairman of FirstBank of Manhattan, said the plan is not equitable for banks or savings and loans.

"We're certainly not in favor (of higher premiums)," he said. "It's going to throw some institutions into insolvency that are solvent now."

A financial institution is insolvent when it does not have sufficient funds to pay depositors what they are owed. Nationwide there are 350 insolvent institutions open. It is estimated that it would cost from $85 billion to $150 billion to bail them out.

Banks are insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and savings and loans are insured by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation.

Hostetler said that under the president's plan, both banks and savings and loans would have to pay higher rates. Primarily, though, it is savings and loans that are in trouble, specifically those in the southwest, he said.

"If a Ford automobile dealer in Topeka goes under, should a Ford dealer in Manhattan have to pay for it?" he said. "(FirstBank's) capital is double what it has to be by law. I don't think the stronger institutions that have been well run and conservatively managed should have to pay for those that have not."

Joe Morris, chairman and chief executive officer of the corporation that owns Columbia Savings of Manhattan, said he thinks the proposal is a positive step.

"The concept that the president has discussed, with the modifications Congress will probably make, will be beneficial for the financial system as a whole," Morris said.

David Hula, instructor of economics, said, "It is an excellent plan, given the constraints that exist.

"One of the senators involved has been quoted as saying, 'It's the closest thing to a swan in a pond filled with ugly ducklings,' and I agree with that."

Ken Lemke, instructor of economics, said, "To understand the current situation, you've got to go back to the 1970s when it all really started."

The main purpose of savings and loans originally was to provide money to people who wanted to buy homes, Lemke said. They accepted deposits from individuals, then loaned that money out. When the loans were repaid, the depositors got their money back.

In recent years, savings and loans have branched out into other areas besides just handling mortgages. The differences between banks and savings and loans are not as great as they once were, he said.

Lemke said in the late 1970s interest on loans increased dramatically and savings and loans had many mortgages paying only 6 percent. As the rates began to rise, savings and loans lost depositors because there was a limit on how much interest they could pay. Because more interest had to be paid on savings than they were charging on loans, the result was negative cash flow.

"The longer they stay open the more money they lose."

—Ken Lemke
instructor of economics

The savings and loans wanted the authority to make different types of loans and to be allowed to expand into other areas, he said. The government eliminated the regulation that limited the amount of interest they could pay and allowed them to make different types of loans.

"In the 1980s many of the loans made in the southwest were to finance petroleum firms and real estate, especially in Texas," Lemke said.

Lemke said the FSLIC does not have enough money to pay off all the depositors in the savings and loans that need to be shut down, so they are being kept open.

"It's a vicious cycle," Lemke said. "The longer they stay open the more money they lose."

Savings and loans can be sold rather than closed down, but Lemke said there could still be problems.

"Running them differently might solve some of the problems, but you've still got to have the money to pay your depositors and you're still stuck with things like oil equipment and empty offices that are hard to get rid of now," Lemke said.

New head of art department sets goals

By The Collegian Staff

The Department of Art is kept together through dedication and motivation, said Charles Stroh, professor of art, and Gary Woodward, head of the department.

Woodward has been head of the art department since Jan. 3 and will be in the position for four and a half years.

In the next two years, Woodward plans to let the staff experiment with courses. The goal of the department is to reduce teaching loads so instructors may develop their own reputations as artists.

The reputations, Woodward said, will grab the attention of the students to draw them into the department. The instructor's development will be left to the individual, Woodward said.

Next fall will start the experimental stage for the department, Woodward said. A new course, called color rendering, has been designed by the faculty for the graphic design students.

During the fall semester, the art department will expand the computer graphics area to experiment in creativity and currency, he said.

"Because of the domination of design students, the department needs to place emphasis on staying up with the times," Woodward said.

More than 50 percent of the art students are in graphic design — a growing trend throughout the country, he said.

"The department has an excellent teaching staff," Woodward said.

The department has four instructors who are nationally and internationally known. Woodward said the department has a good reputation, it just needs to be expanded.

"The department shouldn't be afraid to try anything," Woodward said. "If our ideas don't work, we'll try something else."

Other objectives for the department, Woodward said, include solving the problem of having art classes in five different locations and rejuvenating support from the University.

"Students don't bond to the department like they should because of its scattered location," he said.

In the last several years, the diminished funding has become a challenge for the department.

"It's not all the University's fault, but to maintain quality on less funds is extremely difficult," Woodward said.

He said the department has equipment that can not afford to be fixed.

"The faculty members fix what they can, but some of the equipment is too specialized and is left by the wayside," Woodward said.

"Hard work of the faculty members is basically the only way the department has been able to afford its improvements," Stroh said.

Stroh said he stepped down partly because he grew frustrated with the lack of funding for the department.

"After eight and a half years, it was time for a change," Stroh said.

The art department's operating budget has increased very little since 1980, Stroh said. There has not been an increase in the department's funding for this year.

One example of the faculty's hard work is the darkroom that was built seven years ago, Stroh said. University Facilities estimated it would cost $27,500.

Because the department could not afford $27,500 for a new darkroom, two faculty members spent an entire summer building, buying and scraping together equipment for the facility, he said.

When the project was completed it had cost them less than $5,000.

Charter jet crashes; 144 feared dead

By The Associated Press

LISBON, Portugal — A U.S. charter jet carrying Italian vacationers to the Caribbean crashed into a mountain in the Azores while trying to land in fog on Wednesday. All 144 people on board were feared killed.

The Boeing 707, with a seven-member American crew, was approaching Santa Maria airport on the Atlantic island chain when it hit 1,794-foot Pico Alto and burst into flames, said Afonso Pimentel, a reporter in the Azores for Portugal's LUSA news agency.

"The plane was very low. Everything seemed perfectly normal, then it turned and flew straight into the mountain," said witness Manuel Vairos Figueredo, mayor of the fishing village of Santa Barbara near the airport.

"There was a tremendous explosion. The plane burst into flames and trees around it caught fire. Nobody could possibly have survived," said Vairos Figueredo.

LUSA reported more than 50 bodies had been recovered by nightfall. Heavy fog and difficult access to the crash site hampered rescue workers.

The jet belonged to the U.S. airline Independent Air Corp., based in Smyrna, Ga., which said it was bound from Bergamo, Italy, to the Dominican Republic and then to Jamaica. It had been chartered by

Vote delayed on Tower's nomination

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Senators said Wednesday a first vote on John Tower's nomination as defense secretary will be delayed nearly two weeks while the FBI reviews allegations about his finances and drinking. President Bush stood by Tower and denounced "rumor and frenzied speculation."

"There are new allegations of a financial nature which are now being checked in the Tower nomination," said Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., the Armed Services Committee chairman. He told reporters he could not vote to confirm Tower until the latest charges were checked, and said he had told Bush that.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said new allegations linked Tower to the Pentagon procurement investigation, which has involved payments by defense contractors for classified information regarding lucrative military contracts.

"It has to do with this procurement scandal, the 'Ill Wind' thing," said McCain, using the Justice Department name for the investigation.

Tower has denied trading secrets for cash. But Nunn and other senators have voiced concern about whether Tower could avoid conflicts of interests in view of the more than $1 million he received as a consultant for major defense contractors after ending a 24-year career in the Senate four years ago.

Bush told reporters at the White House he had seen no evidence causing him to lose confidence in his nominee.

"Have I seen anything, or has anything in the FBI report made me want to change my mind as one who would be concerned about insobriety or about failure to be ready for duty 24 hours a day? The answer is 'No, I have not.'

"If somebody has something other than rumor and frenzied speculation, please get it to the FBI or get it to the White House staff, or certainly get it to the committee in the Senate. But let us be fair enough that we do not deal in rumor after rumor," Bush said.

Meanwhile, White House counsel and chief ethics adviser C. Boyden Gray presented the FBI report to Nunn and Sen. John Warner of Virginia, the Senate panel's ranking Republican. The White House said it was "standard practice" for the White House counsel's office to "carry such reports to the hill."

But it also appeared to be a move to appease Nunn, who on Tuesday had expressed irritation that the White House had briefed committee Republicans and not him.

The administration had been pushing for a vote this week, but dropped that after Nunn and Warner met with Bush Tuesday night.

"I told the president frankly that I have serious concerns, and I also stated that if a vote was held immediately as some have urged, I would vote no because of these concerns," Nunn told reporters. The second-ranking Democract on the committee, Sen. James Exon of Nebraska, also said he could not vote in favor of Tower until the FBI completes its investigation.

At the White House, press secretary Marlin Fitzwater said the main new allegation "relates to Senator Tower's activities while he was in the Senate."

Senate Republicans generally defended the nominee.

Their leader, Sen. Bob Dole of Kansas, said he spoke with Tower on the telephone Wednesday morning and found him "upbeat about the nomination."

"He is aware of the new allegation," said Dole, adding that Tower thinks his nomination should be confirmed and "is hanging in there."

Economist: Marxism outdated

MOSCOW — Stalinist socialism and key parts of Marxist theory are wrong or outdated, and the Soviet Union will start selling private homes and land, a leading Soviet economist said Wednesday.

Oleg Bogomolov also said "The Stalinist system was borrowed or imposed on other countries," and that other socialist countries should choose their own way of repairing the damage.

The Soviet Union's looming $160 billion, 1990 budget deficit is "a major stumbling block" for President Mikhail S. Gorbachev's program of perestroika, Bogomolov said at a Foreign Ministry news conference.

He said it might be solved by selling state-owned land to individuals, and by importing video recorders and personal computers and taxing them at up to 10 times their value in the West.

Scarce video recorders sell for about $6,400 to $11,200 in the Soviet Union. Personal computers cost about $48,000 to $112,000.

Leader to move into palace

STOCKHOLM, Sweden — The government won a bid to buy an official residence for its prime minister, a 40-room palace on the waterfront that already has been dubbed Sweden's 10 Downing St., the owners said Wednesday.

The price of the palace, at No. 18 Stromgatan, was about $7.2 million. Prime Minister Ingvar Carlsson won't move in until after $2.4 million in renovations, said Tommy Thulin, an official of the Sager foundation, which owned it.

Carlsson, who rents an apartment owned by the Swedish crown, will have his new home tucked between the prime minister's office and the foreign ministry, with a view toward the royal palace. The 1,380-square-yard building also will include conference halls and foreign ministry offices.

Its last owner, Leo Sager, bequeathed it to the Roman Catholic church on condition his wife could stay as long as she lived. She died in May at age 93.

Until the 1986 assassination of Olof Palme, prime ministers in egalitarian Sweden lived in their own homes.

Students suspended for ritual

BURR OAK, Mich. — Three students burned candles in a restroom during what looked like a ritual, prompting the principal to suspend the students and call the police.

"This is the first time anything like this has happened. It completely shocked us," Burr Oak Junior-Senior High School Principal Robert Peters said.

"We're not sure if this is an isolated case or if it's something we should be worried about," Peters said.

Bill would restrict abortions

TOPEKA — Lawmakers were urged Wednesday to pass a bill that would require most pregnant teen-agers under 18 to obtain parental consent before they could have an abortion.

Opponents to the measure told the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee it would not reduce the number of unwanted pregnancies.

Cynthia Patton, representing Kansas for Life, said when Minnesota passed a similar law in 1980, abortions for teen-gers dropped 40 percent and pregnancies decreased 32 percent.

"We can reduce pregnancy without spending a dime," she said.

Doctors require that parents sign consent forms for other surgical procedures except abortion, she testified.

"No physician except an abortionist will touch your kid unless a consent form has been signed," she said.

Dr. Nancy Toth, a Topeka physician, told the committee that teens who undergo abortions are four times more likely to become suicidal and depressed later on. She said there is growing evidence of a "post-abortion syndrome," similar to the post-stress syndrome, experienced by some combat veterans.

"Abortion is not a trivial procedure that is popularly portrayed," she told the committee.

Judge awards lawyers fees

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A federal judge on Tuesday awarded more than $1.1 million in fees to lawyers who represented rescue workers who suffered emotional injuries in the 1981 Hyatt Regency hotel skywalks collapse.

The fees will be paid by Hallmark Cards Inc., whose Crown Center Redevelopment Corp. subsidiary owns the hotel in downtown Kansas City.

The fees are in addition to about $1.3 million that Hallmark paid in settlements to about 240 rescue workers both within and outside of the class action litigation.

U.S. District Judge D. Brook Bartlett awarded Kansas City lawyer Robert C. Gordon $702,746; James W. Jeans Sr., lawyer and law professor at the University of Missouri-Kansas City, $346,129; and Thomas R. Bellmann, a former law partner of Jeans, $110,000.

The class action suit was settled in December 1987 when Hallmark agreed to set up a $500,000 fund to compensate rescuers who had suffered emotional injuries. The rescuers said they were hurt emotionally from working amid the carnage of the skywalks collapse in July 1981, in which 114 people were killed and more than 200 were injured.

When the class settlement was implemented, 192 class members received a total of about $420,000. The rest of the $500,000 fund is to be used for a program to counsel victims of emotional trauma.

In addition, about 50 other rescuers received about $800,000 in settlements made outside the class.

Number of enrollment applications increases

Top colleges receive fewer than normal

From Staff and Wire Reports

NEW YORK — Despite a drop in the number of high school graduates and mounting concern over tuitions driving down the volume of applications, K-State's early indicators show the number of applications is ahead of last year's even though some of the nation's most prestigious colleges are showing unusual declines.

"Right now in recruitment all indicators say we will reverse the national trend," said Pat Bosco, associate vice-president for institutional advancement.

Bosco said K-State has been very aggressive in its recruiting in recent years and has been able to accelerate admissions.

"We make contact (with students) very early in the senior year of high school and encourage them to make plans," he said.

With the last three years showing positive gain in many areas and internal indicators showing no decline, Bosco said he believes the University can compete against other institutions whose enrollments are falling.

Harvard University spokesman Peter Costa estimates a 5 percent to 10 percent drop in applications compared with a year ago, the first such decline in at least two decades. Nearly all other Ivy League schools are reporting declines in that range.

The application deadline for next fall's freshman class was Feb. 1 at many selective schools around the country.

Stanford University's fall applications have dropped about 6 percent, from 15,828 to 14,869, according to Lynne Madison, assistant dean of undergraduate admissions.

At highly competitive University of California at Berkeley, applications are also down, from 21,944 to 20,835 for next fall's entering class.

"It's really got to be the decline in the number of high school graduates," said Linda Davis Taylor, dean of admissions at Amherst College, in Amherst, Mass., where fall applications have dropped about 4 percent.

"I've been calling around myself, and most of the colleges I've talked to are experiencing declines at least as great as ours," she said.

"I consider this a yellow light. We all kind of anticipated this," said Bradley Quin, admissions director of Lafayette College in Easton, Pa., where applications are down about 5 percent. "I don't mean to imply that we're not concerned. This is a competitive business, and it's going to make it that much harder to increase the quality of our classes."

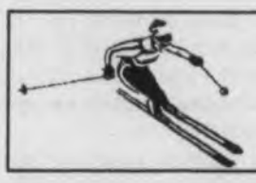
School officials say it's too soon to draw hard conclusions, but they cite several factors in explaining the sudden reversal.

In effect, they said, higher education has been defying gravity for most of the 1980s. To the surprise of many, college enrollments have grown from 12.1 million to 12.5 million since 1980, and are up at 54 percent of the nation's colleges and universities, according to an annual survey by the American Council on Education.

An increase in the ranks of older students and higher percentages of high school students attending college helped offset a steady decline in the number of graduating high school seniors.

But the current drop in applications may be the first sign that population changes may finally be taking their toll. Roughly 3 million 18-year-olds attended college in 1980; but the high school class of '88 has shrunk to an estimated 2.76 million, and is expected to bottom out at 2.44 million by 1992.

Students also may be cutting down on the number of schools they apply to after a decade in which multiple applications increased sharply.



An annual survey of entering freshmen by the American Council on Education and the University of California at Los Angeles found that a record 37 percent applied to at least three colleges last fall, compared with 26 percent in 1980.

That increase has generally been attributed to students wanting to improve their odds of getting into a top school, and also to shopping around for the best financial aid deals as tuitions have soared.

But students are apparently starting to think twice about submitting a dozen or more applications now that application fees have hit $50 and more.

U.S. foreign policy encourages Marxism

Commentary

Kale Baldock
Contributing Columnist

Mentioning the word Marxism generates a number of images and conceptions in people's minds: bread lines, labor camps, secret police, repression, and "the Red menace." Of course, these ideas are linked to the Soviet Union, the major bastion of "communism" in the modern world.

It is definitely correct to associate most of the negative ideas just mentioned with the Soviet Union — save maybe "Red menace," which is merely propaganda reminiscent of McCarthyism designed to arouse unthinking hatred.

But to associate the terms Marxism and communism with the Soviet Union is problematic. The Soviets may claim to be "Marxist" and "communist" all they want, but this amounts to nothing more than the opportunistic self-delusion of the entrenched bureaucrats who run the country. The fact remains that the Soviet system is not a whit akin to the communism envisioned by Karl Marx.

Marx's theories must be considered for what they are, in and of themselves, in order to understand them without prejudice. This is what a great number of people in Latin America have been doing since early in the century, so it is essential to adopt the same point of view they have brought to Marxism in order to understand why they have been attracted to it.

When referring to Marx's theories, I will use the term Marxism rather than communism in an attempt to avoid provoking any knee-jerk misconceptions the reader may still retain from the Reagan era.

Probably the most common argument one hears against Marxism is that it is "totally ideological" and "utopian." Also, one hears that it is not pragmatic and will never work.

Why? "It is against human nature."

"That's just not the way people are."

Of course, inherent in these responses is the idea that capitalism and the free enterprise system are the paradigms of what human nature is all about. Some people, our most recent former president included, will go so far as to claim they are inspired by God.

Tell all of that to the hundreds of millions of Latin Americans who, over the past century, have been reaping the "benefits" capitalism has brought them: landlessness, joblessness, starvation, polluted water, squalor, and disease.

I guess what I said before about understanding Marxism "without prejudice" doesn't apply here in a pure form. The poor in Latin America have ample reason to have biased feelings toward Marxism.

A few years back, a government official gave his solution to this trend by saying something like, "Create a middle class down there and they'll be no more interested in Marxism than a man in the moon."

This sounds good, but it is actually rather naive. After all, this is the strategy the United States has taken in Latin America since President Kennedy instituted the Alliance for Progress program in the early 1960s.

Kennedy intended the Alliance for Progress to "reverse the fatal policy of economic colonization, humiliation, and exploitation" the region had suffered. This it did not do.

Ironically, Kennedy also hoped the program would turn the continent into "a crucible of revolutionary ideas," which it did. But the ideas it helped to foment were antithetical to the ones Kennedy had in mind.

Almost every scholarly analysis of the Alliance for Progress that I've read has been highly critical of it, exposing it for the political and big business sham it came to be, in spite of whatever benevolent intentions its framers had.

In her book, "Cry of the People," the prominent scholar on Latin America, Penny Lernoux, points out that indeed some funds "supported educational programs, low cost housing, and the like," but that such efforts were "peripheral to the main thrust of development," which focused on "foreign control of the most dynamic Latin American industries and co-optation of the small upper and middle classes that wield the economic and political power and can afford the consumer goods produced by foreign subsidiaries."

This is radical. But the seemingly countless cases of political and economic charlatanism Lernoux describes and documents throughout the book provide undeniable credence for her case.

The economic violence committed via the Alliance for Progress and so-called economic development efforts in general was only part of a two-pronged approach the United States took in its policy toward Latin America beginning in the early 1960s.

The Kennedy administration, alarmed by developments in Cuba, put into motion the program of counterinsurgency training for Latin American police and military forces which continues to this day.

Designed specifically to combat "communist" tendencies among the people, the policy has given free reign to its benefactors, who have typically labeled "communist" any attempts by the people to better their economic conditions by collective means, such as farm cooperatives.

Counterinsurgency forces are notorious for their brutality in dealing with such "subversives."

In "The Culture of Terrorism," Noam Chomsky describes the grisly results of recent U.S.-supported counterinsurgency in Central America.

"In Central America, the Reagan Doctrine deserves a large share of credit for a most impressive slaughter. The death toll in El Salvador passed 50,000 and in Guatemala it may approach 100,000. ... In El Salvador and Guatemala the terrorist force attacking the population is the army. ... This was, furthermore, not ordinary killing, but rather Pol Pot-style atrocities, with extensive rape, torture, mutilation, 'disappearances,' and similar measures to ensure that the population would be properly traumatized."

If this is what the forces of capitalism have brought to Latin America, can there be much question as to why those who have suffered might turn to Marxism as an alternative? The case is the same, only reversed, in Afghanistan, where the forces of "communism" have plundered the country, leaving among the people a hatred of everything associated with the term.

It is wrong to blindly blame "Soviet subversion" for fomenting the appeal of Marxism in Latin America.

The United States has done quite a good job of it without any help. And, if our policies continue unchanged, there is no reason to think the phenomenon won't expand.

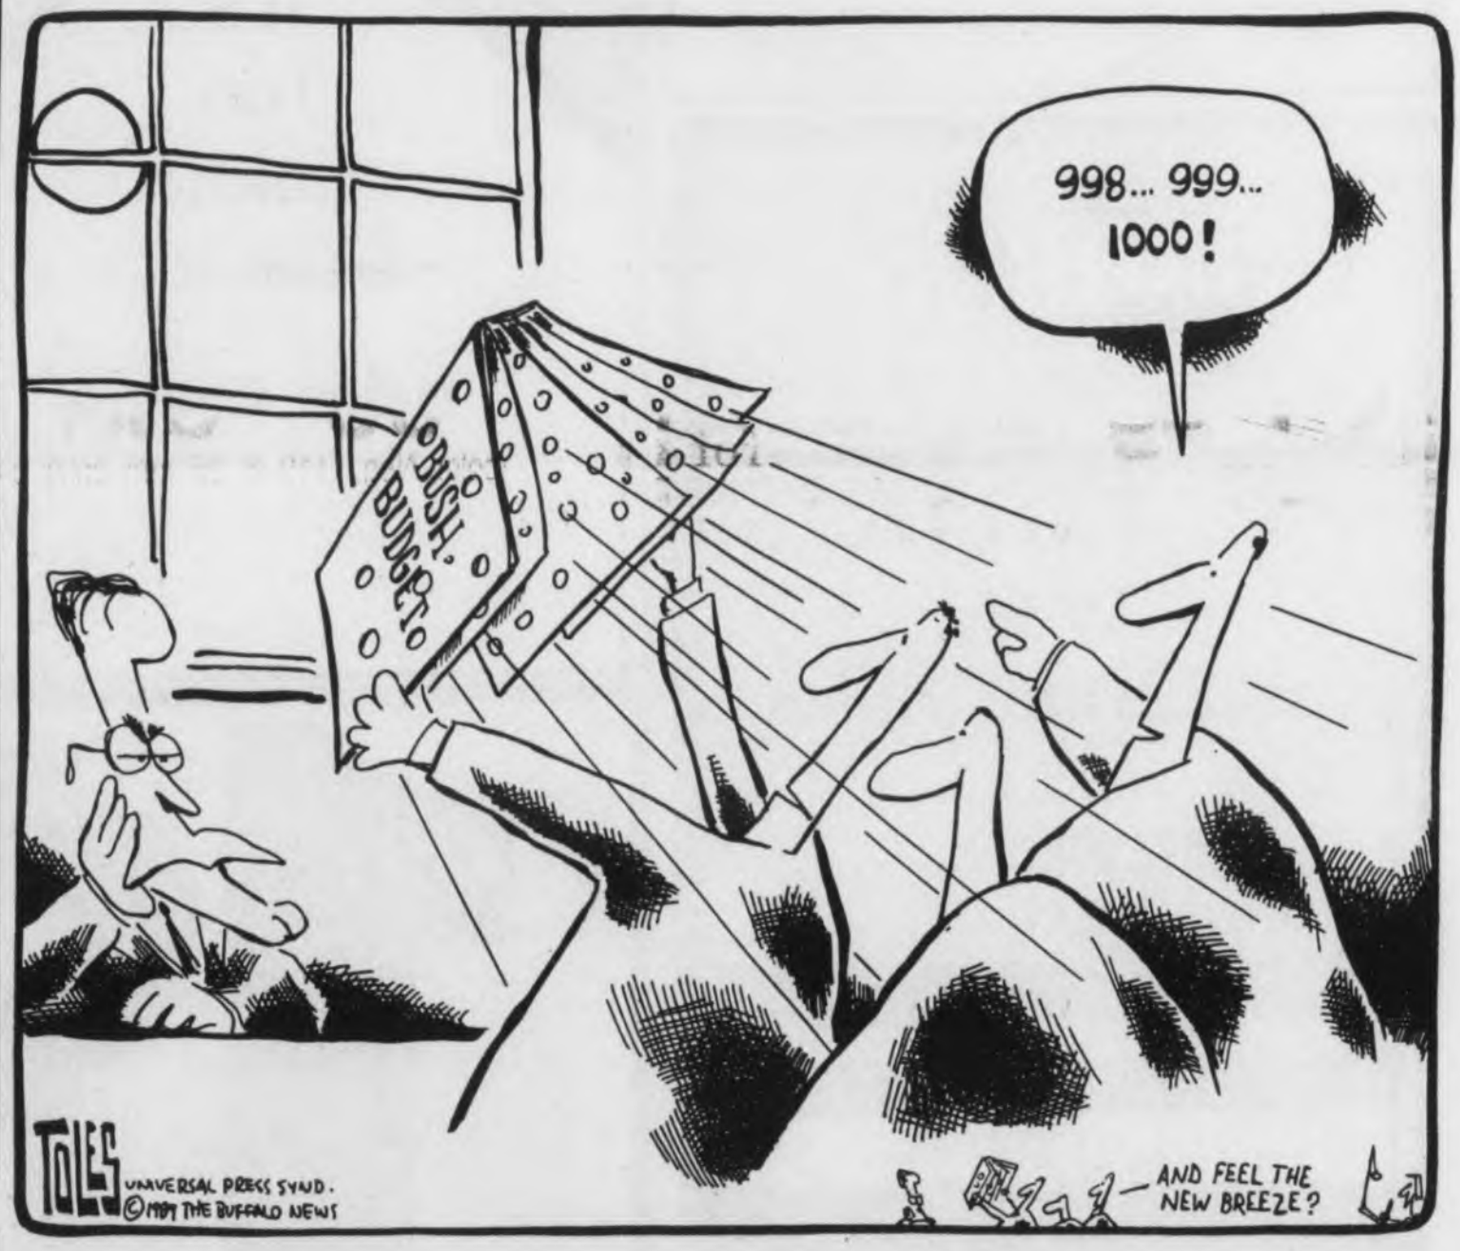
Airport improvements now important priority

It's finally been named a top priority.

Members of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce have listed improvements to the Manhattan Municipal Airport as one of their priorities for 1989.

As part of that priority, chamber members would like to see funding approved for the construction of a control tower at the airport.

However, according to the Federal Aviation Administration, the airport does not have enough yearly operations to make a tower necessary. And, because it's unnecessary, federal funding will be difficult, if not impossible, to receive.



The FAA's declaration that the second busiest airport in Kansas does not need a control tower is debatable. However, it's ironic that city officials are saying that although the tower is now listed as a priority, it doesn't mean they are saying that not having one is unsafe for those who use the airport.

By the end of this year, one of the city's priorities for the airport is to have cited a source of funds for construction of a new terminal.

The present terminal just underwent a renovation. However, within the next two to three years, a new structure could be built. The cost of the terminal has been projected at about $1 million.

If the city wants the FAA to bend the rules and allow the funding of a tower at an airport that doesn't quite meet the number of operations needed for one, it needs to make its own solid commitment to the airport's growth.

By going ahead and planning the construction of a control tower and a new terminal, the city would be showing the FAA that it is concerned with providing the best possible service for passengers and pilots — even if it means taking a risk and using some initiative.

Banning alcohol ads is not the answer, just like banning cigarette ads was not the answer to reducing lung cancer deaths.

If Congress really wanted to do something about alcohol abuse by underage drinkers, it would funnel more money into educational programs and impose stricter regulations on alcohol-serving establishments.

Black women vulnerable

Racial stereotypes affect rape

Fear of rape is a cold wind blowing all the time on a woman's hunched back. Never to stroll alone on a sand road through pinewoods, never to climb a trail across a bald, without that aluminum in the mouth when I see a man climbing toward me.
— The Missouri Rape Poem

Commentary

Barbara Baker
Collegian Columnist

Regardless of race or class, one fact is certain. The fear of rape is owned by all women because every woman can and may be a victim of rape.

Over the past years, I have been very concerned about how racism has impacted on such a diverse subject as rape. There seem to be hidden perceptions and images that suggest black females are never raped.

According to the October issue of Ebony magazine, black women are less likely to be believed when they report a rape to law enforcement and criminal justice systems.

Black women are less likely to believed because of the racist, societal stereotype that all black women are sexually promiscuous. With such a racist stereotype, it is also easy to see why black women might become more susceptible to the frequent occurrence of rape.

In addition, many black women do not report rape because they fear racial humiliation and retaliation.

University of Illinois-Chicago criminologist Dr. Darnell Hawkins said studies reveal that prosecutors are reluctant to pursue black victims' cases because jurors still find it hard to believe black women can really be raped.

An FBI report found rape was twice as likely to happen to black females as white females.

Yet black women and women of color in general seem to be hidden when it comes to rape, even in the portrayals of rape.

A few months ago, I saw a television program in which the scenario suggested that a black female had been raped. She was draped in a towel, severely beaten and a racial remark was written above her body.

Actually, she hadn't been raped. A group of women from different ethnic backgrounds had beaten her. Apparently, she had been flirting with the white gang leader's boyfriend.

Even if one ignores the rape scenario, some other stereotypes come into play and should be mentioned.

One stereotype is that when a man is involved, women become jealous, competitive and cunning. And, of course, one should never date or flirt interracially without expecting punishment.

I realize this is television, but how many of us believe these things? We should be concerned about the messages and images we're receiving.

If you're a black woman, you're hearing and seeing, "No, you can't be raped. If you are, no one is going to believe you."

Society is hearing and seeing, "No, black women are never raped."

It is also important to remember that rape is not committed by only one racial group or class of men. Rape is committed by men of all shapes, sizes and colors.

In order to promote rape awareness and to stop racially defined notions of rape, we must work together. Rape and the threat of rape know no color lines. In order to stop rape, we, as well, must know no color lines.

Tax cut proposal sent to committee

From Staff and Wire Reports

TOPEKA — House debate will continue on legislation which would stop collection of $79 million in windfall by lowering tax rates for individual income taxpayers.

Today the House will take up the conference committee report. The report restores the tax cut bill to the original form in which Gov. Mike Hayden proposed it.

The House made many amendments to the bill last week after it passed the Senate unchanged, but it never actually voted on the legislation because of the number of amendments.

House Democrats oppose Hayden's plan asking for inclusion of property tax relief in the package to compensate for the results of reappraisal and classification changes. Some Republicans oppose the plan because it doesn't include an option to allow taxpayers to claim the federal taxes they pay as a deduction on their state returns.

Explaining the Democratic position in the House, Katha Hurt, D-Manhattan, said Democrats are not "totally against some return through tax cuts."

"With reappraisal and classification causing such havoc and concern we're just trying to wait and see what we'll need to do to offset that," she said.

Last week's House amendments reduced the income tax cuts to $53 million, added federal deductibility, created a $50 million school property tax reduction fund and ensured that Kansas would follow along with future changes in federal tax laws.

In a press conference Wednesday, Hayden said he believes the majority of Kansans want the windfall returned.

"The Legislature must not lose sight of the fact that the people of Kansas want the windfall returned," he said.

"Kansans do not want these tax cuts to be held hostage by those who will argue that instead of returning the windfall, it should be spent on new government programs. The public has a great fear that temptation is growing in the Legislature to spend the windfall, rather than return it." Hayden said.

Hurt said the majority of constituents with whom she has spoken are not in favor of windfall return.

"The people I've talked to say, 'I care more about property tax. I'm not going to miss that $121 or $39,' or whatever their return would be," she said.

House Democratic Leader Marvin Barkis does not think the plan will pass the House.

"The bill the House passed had school finance tax relief, federal deductibility and prospective conformity with the federal tax code — all things various House members want. I don't think they're going to settle for the governor's plan," he said.

Wildcat Card creating confusion

By Ginger Miller
Collegian Reporter

Rather than carrying cash to campus, nearly 3,000 students have opened Wildcat card accounts, said Jack Sills, Union director. The Wildcat card is a union-wide, "convenience" card in its second semester of availability.

Malley Sisson, food service director, said there was some concern about the uses of the card. Some students did not understand withdrawls could not be made from their Wildcat card account.

Vera Carr, associate director, said the Union would probably get into problems with state banking laws if the card were used in such a way.

"We're not a bank and we'd be well-advised to stay out of the banking system," Sills said.

Not allowing withdrawls from the account has been one of the biggest problems with the informational material the Union distributes about the card, Sisson said. Changes have been made in the flyers to clarify that the card cannot be used for withdrawls.

The Wildcat card application form explains that the balance is 100 percent refundable the last two weeks of the spring semester or if one can show proof of leaving K-State because of graduation or withdrawl. A $10 fee is assessed if an account is cancelled earlier.

When the system was decided upon, there wasn't any way to know how well it would be received, Sills said. But he hopes eventually everyone on campus will have a card.

In two or three years, the effects of the Wildcat card should be known, Sills said. At that time the question of whether the Union can afford to provide the service will have to be answered.

"As long as we have participation, we can support it," Sisson said.

The system is costly, but Sills said there aren't the additional expenses one might think. K-State chose to lease the Validine system from Griffin Technologies. The system cannot be bought, Sills said, and rent is $4,746 per month.

"Griffin is the only one that offers a total system," Sills said. "There was only one that was very competitive with Griffin. We have picked the Cadillac of this type of system, both in terms of providing and receiving services."

Three on-sight visits were made before the Validine system was chosen. Sisson said the food service desperately needed new cash registers and this system was impressive.

The Validine system uses software that gives product movement information, where the old registers did not, she said. This lets food service know exactly what area the sales are coming from.

When students make purchases at the Union, they will benefit in the long run, Sisson said. After the expenses are met, excess money is used to continue current services, add new equipment and make services more convenient.

"We want to make shopping at the Union attractive," Sisson said.

At the beginning of each semester incentive plans are offered to encourage students to sign up for the card, Carr said. With a minimum opening balance, the cardholder receives a Union coupon book. In August, a telemarketing effort was also made.

Monday through Friday last semester, an average of about 500 daily transactions were made in food service with the Wildcat card, Sisson said.

The Wildcat card makes the Union more like a shopping center or mall, she said.

ABCs OF FIRST AID

CHOKING

If the victim can speak or cough forcefully, they have good air exchange and should continue their coughing efforts. Do not interfere with the victim. If the victim cannot speak or cough, act promptly, unconsciousness will follow. Perform the Heimlich Maneuver: Stand behind the victim. Grasp your closed fist between the navel and lower tip of the sternum. Press into the victim's abdomen with quick upward thrusts. Repeat 6-10 times. Do not slap the victim's back, this will lodge the foreign object deeper in the air passage. If unconsciousness occurs CALL 911 IMMEDIATELY! Perform CPR until emergency help arrives.

Bush's speech to outline budget

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush will propose more than $250 million in education spending above former President Reagan's budget and will call for a special tax deduction of up to $3,000 per child for adoptions, administration and congressional sources said Wednesday.

The sources, who insisted upon anonymity, said the $1.16 trillion spending plan Bush will outline in a nationally televised speech to Congress at 9 p.m. EST today will project a deficit of roughly $98 billion.

These sources said Bush will blend his call for increases of a few billion dollars on items such as education, aid to the homeless, research and development and the environment — thus redeeming pledges made in his 1988 campaign — with an invitation to Congress to negotiate the spending levels for dozens of other federal programs.

They said the president would recommend spending no more on those programs overall than in the current year as part of a so-called flexible freeze, but would be willing to increase money for some while cutting others and keeping alive still others Reagan targeted for extinction.

It was not immediately clear if that approach will satisfy majority Democrats, who have insisted that Bush make the first comprehensive attempt at drafting a deficit reduction package before they would agree to negotiations. But the Republicans who were briefed on the plan by Budget Director Richard Darman said they were pleased with what they had heard.

The deficit estimate of roughly $98 billion falls within the $100 billion requirement of a federal deficit-reduction law for the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1 but some $5.5 billion higher than Reagan had proposed.

Higher levels in the Bush budget for education, child care, the environment and the homeless account for some of the gap, the sources said.

On the eve of Bush's budget address, more glimpses of the president's $1.16 trillion spending outline surfaced as administration budget officials briefed influential members of Congress on the package.

According to congressional and administration officials, key elements of Bush's package include:

■ A request for $250 million to $300 million more for education programs, much of it for the Head Start program. While formally part of the budget for the Department of Health and Human Services and not the Education Department, for which Reagan had asked $21.2 billion, Head Start provides preschool schooling for disadvantaged youngsters. Bush's plan for a $500 million National Merit School program will be scaled back sharply, however.

■ A tax break to help families recover some of the cost of adoptions, with an emphasis on hard-to-adopt children. During his campaign, Bush repeatedly said he was "for adoption, not abortion." A previous tax deduction of up to $1,500 to help offset adoption costs was eliminated in a 1986 tax-code overhaul. Bush's proposal would restore and expand this tax break, permitting a deduction of up to $3,000.

Former Nazi soldier calls for reunification

By The Associated Press

CHAM, West Germany — A former Nazi SS soldier who leads a growing extremist party told thousands of cheering supporters Wednesday that young Germans bear no guilt for Hitler's extermination of six million Jews.

Franz Schoenhuber, an SS soldier in World War II, also criticized the president of the nation's Jewish community, called for the reunification of Germany and said the European Economic Community was detrimental to German farmers.

In a speech to several thousand supporters of his Republican Party, which has surged in national polls, the 66-year-old politician denied being anti-Semitic.

There are Jewish authors, composers and painters "I like," he said, "but I don't like Mr. Galinski."

Heinz Galinski, who is 76 and survived the Auschwitz death camp, constantly reminds West Germans of the horrors of the Hitler era and criticizes anti-Jewish tendencies of the extreme right wing.

"Mr. Galinski sabotages German-Jewish reconciliation," Schoenhuber said.

Galinski told The Associated Press by telephone from his home in West Berlin: "There will be no comment from me because it is beneath my dignity to argue with Mr. Schoenhuber."

Schoenhuber fought in France and on the Eastern front in World War II, then spent 1½ years as a prisoner of the British. The SS, or Schutzstaffel, was a military unit of the Nazi party and separate from the regular German army.

More than 5,000 supporters, feasting on beer and sausages in the packed hall, interrupted Schoenhuber's two-hour speech frequently with applause and shouts of "Bravo!"

Cityline provides access to information for callers

By Alan Wilds
Staff Writer

Residents in the Manhattan-Junction City area have access to a variety of useful information via the telephone.

Cityline, a free-of-charge, touch-tone phone service detailed in the 1988-89 area telephone directory published by Woodward Publications Inc., brings together several media sources to provide information on news, weather, sports, entertainment and much more, said Susan Mason, audiotext director of Woodward Publications.

"We want to let people know that the media have gotten together to provide this service for everybody," Mason said.

Cityline can be reached by dialing 537-3279 in Manhattan and 762-3279 in Junction City. Then, by entering a four-digit code, the caller has access to various messages on different topics, she said. A complete listing of services appears in the front of the area directory.

The idea for Cityline was conceived when employees of Woodward Publications attended an affiliates meeting in Wichita, Mason said. A local company was already experimenting with a similar program.

"This is really a new revelation for phone directories since people can now have new information at their fingertips," she said.

Woodward Publications has Cityline in operation in four areas, Mason said. The directories are targeted at small- to medium-sized cities and their surrounding towns.

"We stay away from the major metro areas because they already have two or three directories just for one city," Mason said.

The phone messages are updated as often as needed, with the exception of Healthline — a syndicated service provided by the American Medical Association, she said.

"Whenever the public needs a change, we will update," Mason said.

The entertainment services on Cityline for the Manhattan-Junction City area are provided by radio station KJCK-AM/FM in Junction City.

Dave Wiese, KJCK operations director, said it has been a big advantage to the station and an opportunity to promote the area.

The station was experimenting with its own concert and movie line when contacted by Woodward Publications last fall, Wiese said.

"The one drawback to our own movie/concert line was that it had only a Junction City phone number and that made it a long-distance call from Manhattan," he said.

Wiese said he has been pleased with the results of Cityline since it went online Jan. 1, he said.

All of the services are updated at least weekly, Wiese said, except for the concert and movie lines that are updated daily.

Although KJCK has not received its official call counts yet, he said all of the lines are doing well, with the entertainment lines getting the most use.

The directory took about two months to produce and will be updated every year, Mason said, adding that more lines are being planned for next year's directory.

"More territory is covered with these directories and it gives businesses in small towns a chance to advertise," she said.

Kansas locations promoted to film producers

Brochure to help raise funds

By Jodi Johnson
Collegian Reporter

Members of the Kansas Film Commission are hoping a new 12-page brochure promoting Kansas locations will attract the eye of film producers in California and bring extra revenues to the state.

The brochure, "58 Clips of Kansas," will be distributed at a film industry trade show in Los Angeles later this month, said Mary McCaffrey of the Kansas Film Commission.

"The producers of the films will call in with a certain location interest," McCaffrey said. "We then send the producers photographs of various locations in Kansas which best suit what they are looking for.

"We like to send them photographs of as many different locations as possible, because the more we send them, the more likely they are to come into the state."

The purpose of distributing the brochure at the trade show is to make producers of commercials, movies, television miniseries and features more aware of the locations in Kansas.

"The brochure shows the filmmakers a variety of locations in the state," McCaffrey said. "Some filmmakers have the preconceived idea that Kansas is all flat and wheat fields. We want to show them we have rolling hills, rivers and big cities just like other states."

The brochures will help attract lucrative film productions to Kansas, said Secretary of Commerce Harland Priddle.

"Film productions generate enormous revenues, and every state has a film commission competing to get those revenues," Priddle said. "This new brochure will keep us competitive. It will show producers things they may know we have, but I think it will also show them a lot that they don't know about Kansas."

The Kansas Film Commission was organized in 1982 after the filming of the television movie "The Day After." It was then the state realized the benefits the film commission could bring.

"When the economic impact was seen after the filming of 'The Day After,' the state organized the film commission to promote Kansas locations to other filmmakers," McCaffrey said. "Before the commission was organized, any kind of film promotion was done by the individual communities. Now the film commission actively promotes the state as a whole."

Revenues brought into the state since the film commission was organized have increased from $500,000 in 1985 to $8 million in 1988.

Throughout the next year, the Kansas Film Commission will expand the promotion with advertising agencies to hopefully attract more commercial makers into the state, McCaffrey said.

'Cats, Cyclones to tangle

By Mike Goens
Sports Writer

Two teams fighting to keep their postseason hopes alive will meet at 8:05 tonight in Bramlage Coliseum.

K-State, 12-7 overall and 3-4 in the Big Eight Conference, will meet the Iowa State Cyclones, 11-8 overall and 2-5 in conference play. K-State still has NCAA tournament hopes and Iowa State has a shot of making the National Invitation Tournament.

Iowa State is struggling with the departure of three senior starters — all-American Jeff Grayer, Lafester Rhodes and Gary Thompkins.

Add to that list senior forward Elmer Robinson, who left the team after 14 games averaging 15 points, and the Cyclones seem to have definite experience problems.

Iowa State is led by sophomore center Victor Alexander, who is averaging 19 points and eight rebounds a game.

"They have a very mobile unit," K-State coach Lon Kruger said. "Alexander is very effective inside. They surround him with people who shoot the ball well."

Iowa State is coming off a 126-97 loss Monday at Oklahoma after trailing only 43-37 at the half. Forward Sam Mack led the Cyclones with 24 points, followed by Alexander with 19, and Mark Baugh with 17.

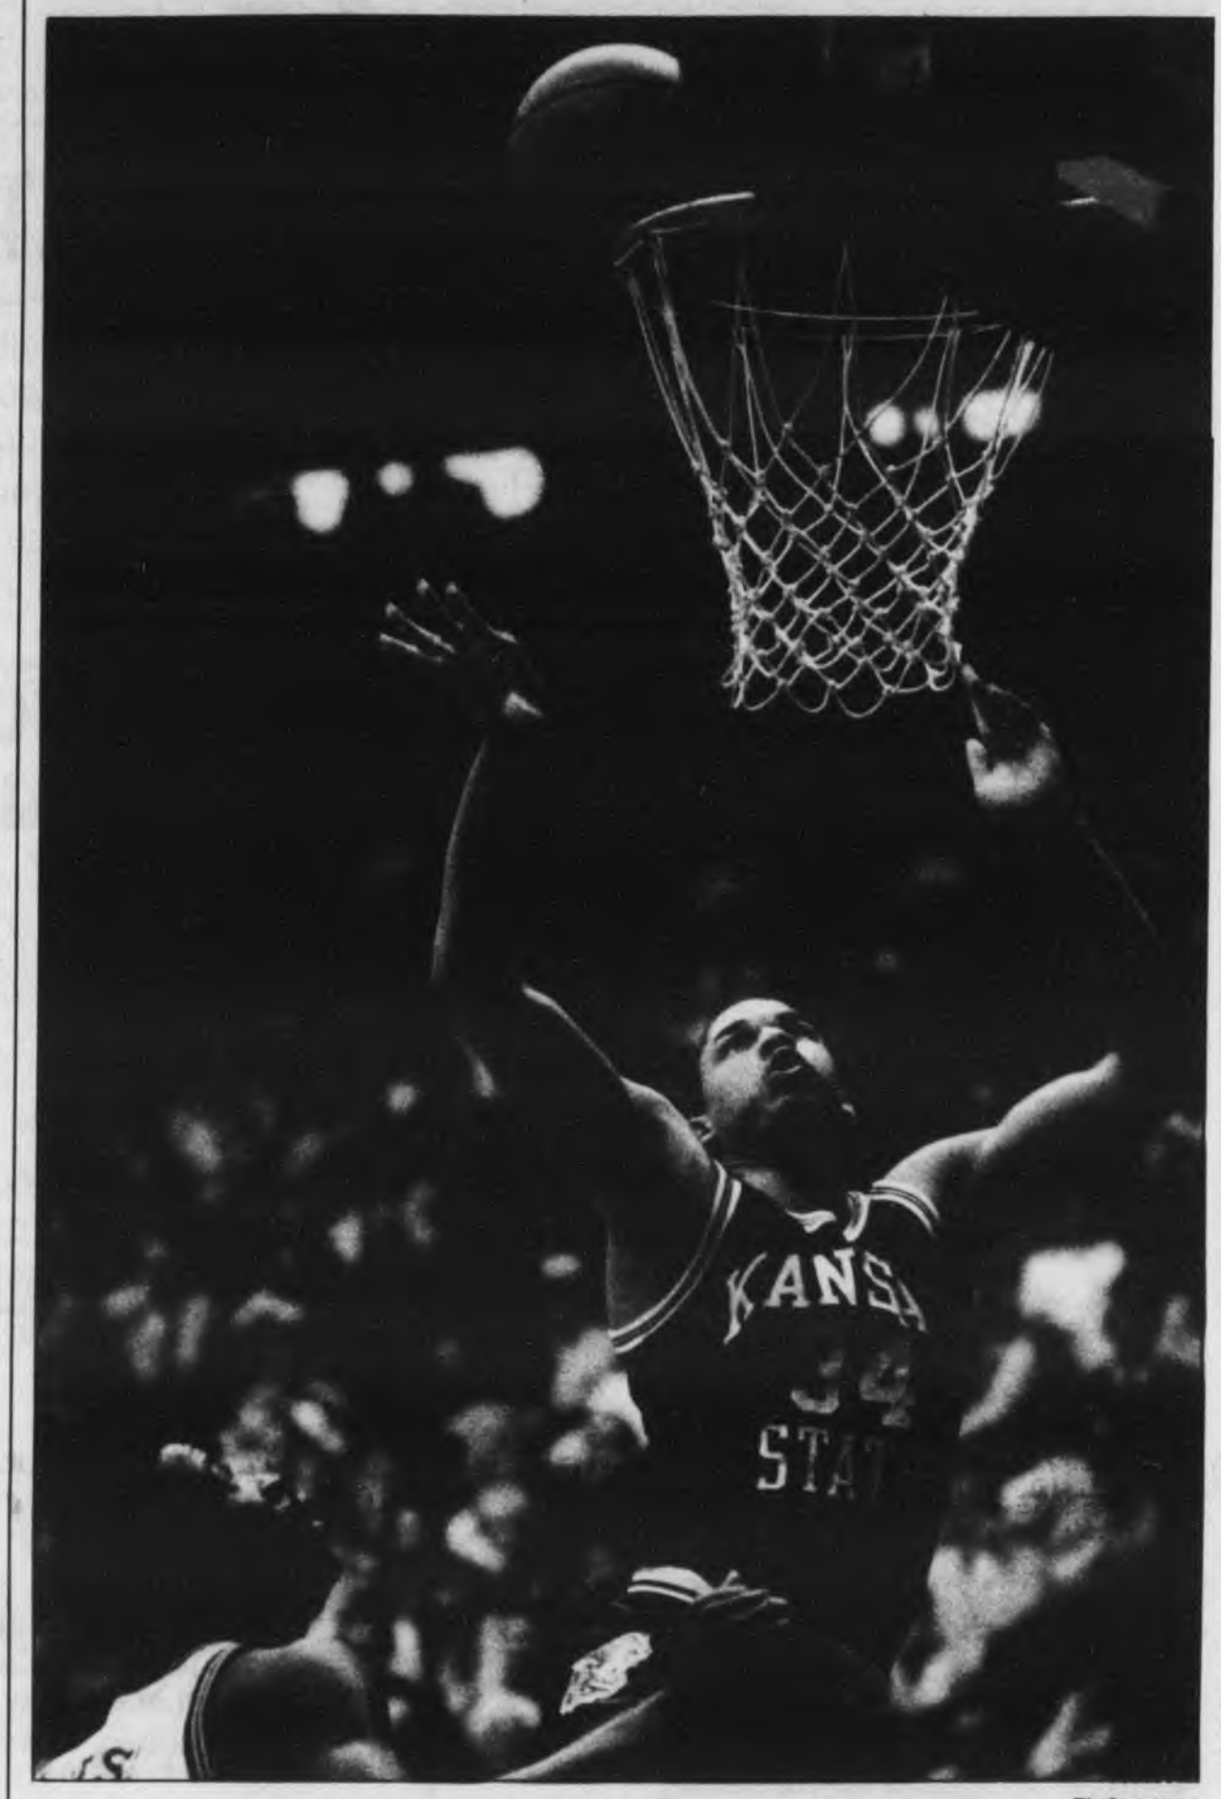
Baugh is the second leading scorer on the team at 12.4 and Mack averages 10 points a game.

K-State has lost three of its past four games and two in a row. Those losses, however, have come at the hands of some formidable opponents, falling at Oklahoma State and Missouri and at home to Oklahoma.

In the 73-68 loss to Missouri, K-State once again didn't finish the game well.

"We're playing hard for 37 minutes, but we're not playing the last three," K-State guard Steve Henson said of the losses to Oklahoma and Missouri.

"I think the players have been properly disappointed," Kruger said. "We're playing well, but we're coming up short.



"It becomes frustrating. We're not making progress, but we are taking positive steps. I think our confidence is making progress, but that progress hasn't been rewarded with a 'W.'"

After tonight's game, K-State meets Nebraska on Saturday in Bramlage.

Injury fails to stop Simmons

File/Greg Vogel
K-State forward Lance Simmons shoots a jump shot during the game against Kansas on Jan. 28. Simmons moved into the starting lineup for the 'Cats during this game and has started the last three games.

By Mike Goens
Sports Writer

K-State junior Lance Simmons thought basketball might be over for him late last March.

Simmons, who had sat out last year due to a broken kneecap he suffered in November 1987, admits he thought he might never play again, let alone start, after he suffered the same injury in March.

"It's a dream come true," Simmons said. "I didn't think I would ever start again or play again after hurting my knee."

But play he has. Simmons moved into the starting lineup against Kansas two weeks ago in Lawrence, and has started the last three games for the Wildcats.

Simmons was a major factor against KU. Although he scored only six points, he pulled down a team-high 10 rebounds and played solid defense against KU's taller front line.

"I knew Kansas had a good team with good post men," said the 6-foot-5 forward from St. Louis. "I basically felt pretty good about my leg, it felt strong. It was a great feeling to come in and contribute."

"That was probably his best stretch — against KU," K-State coach Lon Kruger said. "He bounced back and played well defensively. The way he responded was important."

Since starting at KU, Simmons has continued to be consistent. Saturday he scored a season-high 12 points against Missouri and once again led the team in rebounding with seven.

"We knew we played hard," Simmons said. "But we can't be satisfied with that."

Simmons was projected as a potential starter before first injuring his knee. Beginning the 1986-87 season, Simmons was in the starting lineup during the absence of Norris Coleman, who was ineligible. When Coleman returned, Simmons returned to the bench.

But Simmons started the last five games of the season, and it was the All-Big Eight star Coleman who came off the bench. Included in that stretch were a win at Oklahoma, two Big Eight post-season tournament games, and a win over Georgia and a loss to Nevada-Las Vegas in the NCAA West Regional.

Simmons was redshirted last season during the Wildcats' run to the final eight of the NCAA Tournament.

Instead of making moves down low against the usually taller Big Eight opponents, Simmons was in rehabilitation.

"It was hard to go in and work out everyday," he said. "Steve Brace, our trainer, pushed me."

Simmons' six-day-a-week workout (Sundays off) included swimming, lifting weights and doing isometrics. "To do it everyday is not fun," he said.

"He was tentative early. Physically, he was less than 100 percent," Kruger said. "It takes time to develop confidence in your physical capabilities and to play with more confidence."

"I felt any strong move I made could reinjure it," Simmons said. "But I don't think about it anymore.

"I feel better now than at the beginning of the year. I think I became 100 percent around late November or early December."

Simmons takes pride in his defense and rebounding above all other things.

"I pride myself in playing good defense in the post area," Simmons said. "It's a lot of hard work. I hate to get scored on.

"If I didn't score and my opponent didn't score, I'd be satisfied."

"Lance does a good job defensively," Kruger said. "He has good instincts and a good feel inside. He is our best defensive player inside.

"Anticipation can't be taught. You have to know what to expect and know what your opponent can do well. Lance has good overall perception inside."

Simmons said his role is to get the important rebounds and play tough defense.

"I do what I can to help our team win," he said. "I look at rebounds first. We pride ourselves on it.

"We have to fight hard, play harder than we have been. I feel a lot more confidence in myself. It is an honor to start after hurting my knee twice."

ISU dumps Lady Cats in overtime

K-State's win streak snaps at 5 games

From Staff and Wire Reports

AMES, Iowa — They needed overtime to do it, but the Iowa State Lady Cyclones downed K-State, 83-75, Wednesday night at Hilton Coliseum, snapping the Lady Cats' five-game winning streak in the process.

Iowa State had grabbed its biggest lead of the second half at 55-46 with 11:18 remaining, but the Lady Cats went on an 8-0 run to get within one, 55-54, and eventually tied it at 62 with 1:43 left.

The Lady Cyclones, however, went on a 7-1 spurt and took a 68-63 lead with just 34 ticks left on the clock. But the Lady Cats put together a furious rally with Nadira Hazim connecting at the 23-second mark and Diana Miller hitting a three-pointer with 12 seconds left to tie it at 68 and eventually sending the game into the extra period.

K-State appeared to be in control in overtime as the Lady Cats jumped out to a 73-70 lead with 3:25 left. But K-State would score only two more points while Iowa State rattled off the last nine points of the extra session to give the Lady Cyclones the victory.

Before the game, Lady Cats' coach Matilda Mossman had expressed concern over her team's rebounding, but K-State outrebounded the Lady Cyclones 40-36, with Rita Matteucci hauling in 10.

The Lady Cats were able to hold Iowa State's leading scorer, Carmen Jaspers, to just 10 points, but Shelly Coyle haunted K-State all night long, tallying a career-high 21 points on 9-of-13 shooting from the field. Tracy Horvath and Vanessa Ward both rounded out the Lady Cyclones' double-figure scoring with 16 each.

K-State was led by Hazim, who netted 20 points, while Diana Miller and Kristie Bahner got 14 and 13, respectively.

The key for Iowa State was denying K-State point guard Mary Jo Miller her season average of 10 points a game. Miller scored only six points and hit just 3 of 11 shots from the floor before fouling out.

K-State falls to 16-6 on the year and 6-3 in Big Eight Conference play.

OSU whips Kansas 87-81 in Lawrence for first road win

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — Darwin Alexander scored 23 points and Thomas Jordan scored 16 Wednesday night, leading Oklahoma State past Kansas 87-81 and frustrating the Jayhawks' fourth straight bid for their 1,400th victory.

Oklahoma State, winning on the road for the first time all year, recovered from an early deficit to post a 41-39 halftime lead and trailed only once in the second half.

The victory raised Oklahma State to 14-6 overall and 5-2 in the Big Eight. Kansas, barred by probation from defending its NCAA title this year, fell to 16-7 and 3-5 with its fourth straight loss. The Jayhawks have tried for two weeks to join Kentucky and North Carolina as the only major programs to win 1,400.

The Cowboys, who beat then-No. 1 Oklahoma in their previous game, nursed 3- and 4-point leads through much of the second half before Milt Newton's free throws gave the Jayhawks a brief 64-62 lead.

But Corey Williams answered with a 3-point goal and then Richard Dumas followed with a bucket and Williams canned a free throw to restore Oklahoma State's 4-point advantage at 68-64.

Mark Randall's follow shot brought the Jayhawks to within two points at 75-73, then Byron Houston hit a 10-footer and Dumas roared in with a thunderous dunk to make it 79-73 with 2:25 left.

Randall had 27 points for Kansas while Kevin Pritchard had 15 and Newton 12.

Williams had 15 for Oklahoma State, now 1-5 on the road.

Snyder signs 20 recruits; 6 in-state

By Scott Paske
Collegian Reporter

K-State football coach Bill Snyder laid down the groundwork for his new program Wednesday as 13 high school seniors and four junior college transfers signed letters of intent to join the Wildcats next fall. Three other players will reportedly walk on.

Snyder focused on defensive linemen to provide support for a unit which finished last in the nation in rushing defense in the 1988 season. Headlining the list was Tony Williams, a 6-foot-5, 285-pound tackle from Riverview Garden High School in St. Louis, Mo. Williams was a Blue Chip All-American and ranked third on the St. Louis Post-Dispatch's Top 10 Most Wanted recruiting list. He selected K-State over Alabama, Illinois and Iowa.

According to a report in The Wichita Eagle-Beacon, Williams has not yet passed the ACT and must do so under NCAA Proposition 48 to avoid being ineligible his freshman year. Jim Greco, Williams' coach at Riverview, said he has maintained qualifying grades in the core curriculum classes.

Joining Williams was Steve Moten, a 6-foot-2, 280-pound lineman from Topeka-Seaman High School. Moten, an all-state selection, was reportedly headed for the University of Kansas earlier last week but decided to sign with K-State because Snyder will let him play defense. He helped the Vikings win the Centennial League championship in 1988 and will compete in the Kansas Shrine Bowl this summer.

"Our primary objective was to support our need for defensive linemen, and we met that objective," Snyder said. "That pleased me because linemen are usually the most difficult to come by."

Snyder was hoping to land a large number of Kansas recruits, but managed only five in addition to Moten. Among the signees were David Haresnape, 6-foot-3, 225-pound lineman from Smith Center, and Brad Seib, 6-foot-4, 210-pound tight end from Hoisington. K-State reportedly also received walk-on commitments from Eric Clayton, 6-foot-6, 270-pound lineman from Salina-Central, and Riley County products Don Hilliard, 6-foot, 220-pound running back, and Brett Weis, 6-foot-1, 235-pound lineman. Snyder would not confirm which of the 18 signees were to be walk-ons next season.

The state of Ohio produced four signees, including junior college transfer Patrick Jackson. A Columbus native who played for two seasons at Waldorf (Iowa) Community College, Jackson was named to the National Junior College Athletic Association's All-American team as a sophomore. He ran for five touchdowns and threw for another in Waldorf's 42-35 win over the Nebraska junior varsity in Lincoln this past season.

Other K-State Signees
—Reggie Blackwell, 6-foot-2, 205, defensive end linebacker from St. Louis-Ritenour
—Sean Dabney, 6-foot-3, 225, lineman from Youngstown, Ohio-Ursuline

KPL declares cold weather situation

By Nancy Prosser
Staff Writer

When outside temperatures drop, K-Staters shouldn't have to worry about classroom temperatures being any less comfortable.

Sub-zero thermometer readings and bone-chilling winds prompted Manhattan Kansas Power and Light to declare an emergency energy usage situation Friday, said Paul Bennett, local district superintendent of KPL Gas Service.

When this happens, KPL has a list of area business and institutions it asks to switch over to an energy mix of oil and gas, Bennett said.

"We do this to maintain the reliability and integrity of energy transmission in the district," he said.

This gives residences and businesses in the areas that don't have alternative power sources an assurance of adequate power to fill their increased needs, Bennett said.

"Customers are ranked on if they have stand-by power or not," he said. "McCall Pattern Company, and Wamego and Clay County power are examples of customers (other than K-State) that we would ask to switch to other powers.

"We rank these customers in a priority list of one through nine with K-State being No. 3. We go backward through the list asking No. 9 customer first. The last time we had to ask a customer to switch over to alternative power was in 1982."

Lee McQueen, assistant director for facilities management, said he was contacted by KPL and asked to switch the University to backup fuel, thus giving local residents priority.

"At that time we switched over to 50/50 gas and oil comsumption," McQueen said. "The situation only lasted for that day and we are currently back to normal all-gas comsumption.

"The costs compare pretty equally. Even though oil prices are cheaper, there is more maintenance and oil is more labor intensive."

Firms that agree to install alternative forms of power are given year-round price breaks by KPL, Bennett said.

Choir to perform in annual fund raiser

By The Collegian Staff

The K-State Choir will present "Serenade Concert 6" this weekend in the Union Ballroom.

"The supper concert will be at 7 p.m. Saturday, and the coffee dessert concert will be at 3 p.m. Sunday," said Rod Walker, professor of music and director of the K-State Choir.

"This is our sixth annual concert," Walker said. "We always do this, since this is our annual, major fund raiser."

The concert involves 40 songs from musicals or performances. To be presented are medleys from "Les Miserables," "The Phantom of the Opera," selections from "Music Man," and a medley of songs by American composer Irving Berlin.

"The choir consists of 70 students," Walker said. "Twenty-four of these will be soloists."

Fifty percent of the choir members have non-music majors and the other 50 percent are music students, Walker said.

"This is a very popular concert and there are always good crowds," he said.

"This concert is always the fun one to attend, and especially a fun one to sing in," said Kristi Mitchell, sophomore in music education and a member of the choir.

"The cost of tickets is a tax-free donation to the choir," Mitchell said. "The money goes into a budget for all choral operations."

No actual money is appropriated from the University to fund the music department, she said. The budget the choir operates on comes from the Student Governing Association.

"All of the money made is put into one large pot," Mitchell said.

Travel funds come out of this budget and this year the funds will go mainly for the choir's tour of Australia, she said.

Tickets are $17 per person for the supper concert and the Sunday performance price is $12 per person. People interested can contact the choral office at 532-5740.

THANK YOU TELEFUND PARTICIPANTS

During the recent College of Education Telefund, our alumni promised more money for scholarchips than ever before. The key to the increase was the dedication of our volunteer callers.

Telefund pledges reached nearly $70,000 due to the commitment of our student and faculty participants night after night, long after the best prospects had given. Although our hopes of exceeding last year's record had been achieved, some of the most outstanding callers asked to call one additional night for the College of Education.

You might wonder why they did that. Was it because of their desire to win the prizes offered through the KSU Foundation? Maybe, but I doubt it.

You see, they could have called for any other college, on any other night with the chance for more personal success, but I believe that their rationale was to help their college, and future and current COE students. These callers, who persisted in their Telefund endeavors long beyond what was expected, displayed a winning desire and giving attitude that was an inspiration to everyone.

I wish to thank everyone who participated in the COE Telefund. Here are the names of those who called, just in case you would like to thank them, too.

Thank you,

Tom Parish

Wichita man convicted of killing sheriff's deputy

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — A man charged with killing a sheriff's deputy during a 1988 drug raid was convicted Wednesday of second-degree murder and other counts.

St. John Tyler, 50, was tried on a first-degree murder charge in the death of Sedgwick County Sheriff's Deputy Terry McNett during a Feb. 2, 1988 drug raid.

On the witness stand during his state district court trial, Tyler admitted shooting McNett. He said it was self-defense. He testified he was in the kitchen counting money, never heard officers identify themselves and assumed rival drug dealers were robbing the northeast Wichita crack house he was operating.

Other witnesses testified Tyler was in the living room when the officers shouted "police" and "sheriff's officers" to announce the raid. They said he ran into the kitchen and then shot McNett in the face at point-blank range.

In addition to finding Tyler guilty of the lesser included offense after four days of deliberations, jurors convicted him of aggravated assault of a law enforcement officer for firing at another deputy, possession of heroin with intent to sell, perjury and sale of cocaine.

Sentencing was set for March 8.

Prosecutors droppped first-degree murder charges against Tyler's common law wife, Pamela TaFoya, when she agreed to a plea bargain this week. TaFoya pleaded to conspiracy, sale of cocaine and possession of heroin and cocaine with intent to sell.

Crash

the Dominican firm Dominair by a consortium of six Italian travel agencies.

Portuguese TV said an anonymous caller claimed responsibility for the crash on behalf of an organization called the Brigada Terrorista International (International Terrorist Brigade).

Police said they knew of no group by that name and suspected the claim was a hoax.

Witnesses said the jetliner's wreckage still burned on Pico Alto five hours after the crash.

LUSA said the first alarm of the crash was given by a resident of Santa Barbara.

The pilot radioed Santa Maria Airport control tower three minutes before the crash but did not report anything wrong, LUSA quoted an unidentified civil aviation official as saying.

The agency said the control tower then tried repeatedly to contact the plane without success.

Earlier unconfirmed reports said the pilot had requested a runway be cleared for an emergency landing.

The jet was scheduled to make a refueling stop in the Azores, a chain of islands west of Portugal. Santa Maria is about 750 miles west of Portugal.

The U.S. Federal Aviation Administration reported fog in the area with visibility of five miles below 500 feet and scattered clouds at 500 feet.

The passengers were "middle-income Italians flying to a sun resort with great beaches" on a package put together by Flamingo Tours of Bergamo, said A.L. Pittman, president of Independent Air in Smyrna, Ga.

Independent Air is 15 years old and flies 400-500 charters per year, mostly in the Caribbean and Europe.

The craft was one of two Boeing 707s owned by Independent Air, Pittman said. He said it had 12,500 cycles, or takeoffs and landings, and fewer than 50,000 hours in the air.

Jack Barker, a spokesman for the FAA, said that was not excessive.

"If properly maintained, there should not be a problem because of hours or number of cycles," he said. "Other aircraft involved in the news have had as much as 50,000 cycles, a great many more."

Forum addresses University's role in farm research

By Carol Knorr
Collegian Reporter

Wearing a button from the American Agricultral Movement bearing the phrase, "We've just begun to fight," Stephen Anderson, Alma, opened a forum Thursday night concerning land-grant institutions in farm research.

Land-grant institutions have failed to comply with laws requiring them to benefit family farmers, said Anderson, AAM spokesman and family farmer.

"Americans have been taught that corporations, credit cash flow and chemicals could replace community cooperation and compassionate concern," he said. "By embracing this economic folly — this economic madness — the entire land-grant system is failing."

Anderson said the failure can be measured by looking at figures such as the five million family farmers driven from their land in the past four decades and the 80,000 Farmer's Home Administration foreclosure notices sent out at Christmas.

He said other examples of failures to help are the rural communities that have lost 50 percent of its population, and environmental problems created by chemical contamination.

The forum was organized to encourage K-State, a land-grant University, to consider the social and environmental impacts of its research, Anderson said. Information concerning a lawsuit against a land-grant institute in California was included in the discussion.

Agricultural research at land-grant institutions are partially funded by the federal Hatch Act of 1988, said Deb Jones, California Action Network director. The act mandates that research projects help family farmers, promote consumer welfare and foster "a sound and prosperous rural life."

Jones explained how CAN won a lawsuit against the University of California in 1987.

"The focal point of the suit was the university's use of the Hatch Act funds," Jones said. "The courts found the university using the funds illegally because the funds had not been utilized for the intended beneficiaries and because there were no administrative ways to evaluate the use of the funds."

Although the university was ordered to submit a five-year plan to ensure proper allocation of Hatch Act funds, the decision has been appealed, she said.

Anderson said it is doubtful AAM will take action against K-State.

"Personally, I don't want to see action taken against K-State," he said.

K-State researchers and administrators are reasonable and will probably take action to comply with the Hatch Act because of the precedent set in California, he said.

Fred Kilian, local farmer, said a lawsuit was not likely to evolve against K-State primarily because of funding.

"Society has confused change, both good and bad, with progress."
—Stephen Anderson
AAM spokesman

"I don't see how farmers will be able to finance something like that," he said. "But at least with a forum such as this, people will be more aware of the problems concerning farming today."

"What we really want to know is if the land-grant system has any specific priorities," Anderson said. "And if they do — what are they? We want to know how land-grant research priorities and values compare in our rural communities."

Kurt Feltner, associate director of the Agricultural Experimental Station, said he was not aware of any circumstances that could lead to a lawsuit against K-State for not complying with the act.

"We are utilizing input from producers, advisory committees and special groups — such as the one tonight (Thursday) — to help us draw a roadmap for the next decade," he said.

The University is reviewed every five to seven years by the Cooperative State Research Service to ensure proper use of funds, he said.

K-State receives 10 percent of the $30 million allocated for research from the Hatch Act funds, and the state more than matches that funding, Feltner said.

Spring enrollment figures show increase

By Mindy Robert
Collegian Reporter

For the fourth consecutive semester, K-State enrollment figures increased.

Final spring enrollment after 20 days of classes is 17,838, said Don Foster, registrar. The figure is an increase of 532 students over last spring's numbers.

Foster said 964 more students enrolled for on-campus courses than did last spring for a total on-campus enrollment of 16,202.

The increase in spring enrollment is directly related to the retention of students from the fall semester, said Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement and dean of student life.

Bosco said enrollment will continue to increase if "we can provide a positive learning environment for the currently enrolled K-State student."

The enrollment drop experienced in the early 1980s was due to a continual decrease in freshman enrollment, Foster said.

"We have turned that around, so we will continue building on these (students) another few years," he said. "The emphasis on academic advising is a key to students continuing at the University."

The adviser's personal knowledge about academics and the relationship developed with the students will keep students here, Foster said.

"As long as we provide a quality K-State classroom and student life, we will be OK," Bosco said.

A satisfied student also aids in recruitment, he said.

President Jon Wefald said the work of admissions representatives and the realization of people throughout that K-State is an outstanding university contributed to the enrollment increase.

Enrollment increased in all of the undergraduate colleges except the College of Agriculture.

The College of Business Administration increased its enrollment by 198 students. Randolph Pohlman, dean of the college, said the increase is due in part to the college's "incredibly fine programs."

The Department of Accounting received accreditation one year ago, Pohlman said, and is the only accredited accounting department in the state and one of 40 in the nation.

Enrollment in the College of Human Ecology increased by 97 students.

"The key (to the increase in enrollment) is the revision of our curricula," said Barbara Stowe, dean of the College of Human Ecology.

"We spend a lot of time on the road talking to potential students concerning the programs we have to offer," Stowe said.

Two other colleges experiencing large increases in enrollment are the College of Education, up 151 students, and the College of Arts and Sciences, up 376 students.

Bush summons Congress to work with him

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush proposed more money for domestic programs and restraint of the Pentagon budget Thursday night as he summoned the Democratic Congress to work with him to "ensure a better tomorrow."

In a well-received, 50-minute address to a joint session of Congress, the president vowed to proceed with caution in his dealings with Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev. Still, he added, "We will not miss any opportunity to work for peace."

Bush devoted most of his speech to domestic issues, as he sketched the outlines of a $1.16 trillion budget. He called for $2.6 billion in reductions from former President Reagan's Pentagon spending plan and modest increases in selected domestic programs such as education and the environment.

He repeated his longstanding vow of no new taxes.

Less than one month on the job, the new president echoed the campaign of 1988 with his declaration that he wants to be an education president, wants the death penalty for drug kingpins and favors a cut in the capital gains tax.

He made a notable bow to the environmentalists with a call to suspend three oil leases; and another to the anti-abortionists with his call for an increased tax break for parents who adopt a child.

He called for a society "free from discrimination and bigotry" and threw a bouquet in the direction of Democrat Jesse Jackson when he said — as Jackson did to kids in the inner cities — "Keep hope alive."

Above all, he summoned the Democratic Congress to join with him in solving the deficit problem.

"The people didn't send us here to bicker," said the new president. "It's time to govern."

Bush also voiced his personal support for making Puerto Rico the nation's 51st state and called on Congress "to take the necessary steps to let the people decide in a referendum."

And he said he would set up a new Task Force on Competitiveness, chaired by Vice President Dan Quayle.

Saying "the most important competitiveness program of all is one that improves education in America," he traced a number of schooling initiatives.

The Bush speech was not a State of the Union address — but it stood for one, touching upon key foreign policy issues as well as a wide range of domestic concerns.

"I don't propose to reverse direction," he said. "We are headed the right way." Nonetheless, he proposed a string of initiatives that signaled an end to some of the restraints set by the Reagan administration.

Bush received a standing ovation when he entered the House chamber, packed with members of the heavily Democratic Congress, the Supreme Court, his Cabinet and staff and guests. Barbara Bush joined in the applause from her seat in the gallery.

The president shook hands with several lawmakers as he made his way down the center aisle on his way to the speaker's rostrum. Among the guests seated prominently on the floor were John Tower, his confirmation as Secretary of Defense in jeopardy.

The president's budget plan, which features a one-year freeze on scores of federal programs, calls for roughly $5 billion more spending than the budget submitted by Reagan last month and carries out Bush's oft-stated vow of not seeking any increase in taxes.

The freeze on these non-military programs is tougher than the Pentagon freeze. The non-military programs are frozen at current spending amounts, but the Pentagon budget rises to take inflation into account.

He said his offer to freeze Pentagon spending was conditioned on reaching an overall agreement with Congress that included budget reforms. He proposed that the gov-

Plan for cutting deficit unrealistic, professors say

By Kendra Gensemer
Government Editor

In his budget address to Congress Thursday, President Bush recommended policy that he said would result in a 40 percent cut in the federal deficit within a year, but some K-State economics professors don't see that happening.

"Right now the national deficit is right around $150 billion," said Richard H. Megna, assistant professor of economics. "My impression was that it's not clear where he can (cut the deficit 40 percent)."

Bush made recommendations that would require increases in spending, but a proposed one-year freeze on defense spending was the only mention of a spending decrease.

"A freeze on the defense budget would not pay for all the programs he wants to accomplish," Megna said.

Merlin D. Gustafson, associate professor of economics, said Bush was not specific about spending on social programs.

"He advocated a lot a social programs, but didn't say much on where the money would come from," Gustafson said.

Megna said he believed Bush was making a shift in emphasis from former President Reagan's policies.

"In terms of overall spending, I got the feeling Bush is at least proposing social programs, which is a definite shift in emphasis," he said. "He wants to spend more on

Jamaican election violent

KINGSTON, Jamaica — Socialist Michael Manley appeared headed for victory over conservative Prime Minister Edward Seaga on Thursday in an election marred by gunfire and allegations of widespread fraud.

With 41 percent of the ballots counted, Manley's party had 217,956 votes, or 59 percent, and Seaga's party had 150,494, or 41 percent.

The early results closely matched the findings of an opinion poll Sunday that predicted Manley's left-leaning People's National Party would capture 48 of the 60 seats of Parliament. Seaga's right-of-center Jamaica Labor Party now holds all 60 seats.

Manley was prime minister from 1972 to 1980. His government then embraced Cuba, alarming the United States and foreign investors, but he lately has projected a more moderate image. Seaga has been one of the Caribbean region's strongest U.S. allies.

Chernobyl fallout monitored

MOSCOW — Fallout from the Chernobyl nuclear disaster contaminated one-fifth of Byelorussia to the point that officials are monitoring the health of more than 300,000 people, Tass reported Thursday.

The official news agency asked in its dispatch why nearly three years passed before those who lived just north of the stricken nuclear power plant were told how seriously their health was threatened.

"Is this not too late to tell the public the complete picture of the radiation situation?" the agency asked.

Vladimir Yevtukh, chairman of the area disaster relief commission, responded with a comment that implied residents of the area still might not know if President Mikhail S. Gorbachev had not introduced his policy of glasnost, or openness.

"Glasnost and the democratization of public life played no small role in the making public the data on the radiation situation in the republic," he was quoted as saying.

Soviets buy more U.S. grain

WASHINGTON — The Soviet Union has bought another 600,000 metric tons of U.S. wheat at subsidized prices, the Agriculture Department said Thursday.

Christopher E. Goldthwait, acting general sales manager for the department's Foreign Agricultural Service, said the wheat was part of an authorization of more than 2 million tons under the Export Enhancement Program, or EEP.

Goldthwait said the wheat is for shipment in March. Counting some left over from a previous EEP arrangement and 2 million tons authorized Jan. 25, the Soviets have more than 1.4 million tons still available under the program.

With the latest sale, the Soviet Union has bought about 2.6 million tons of wheat for delivery in the sixth year of a long-term supply agreement, which was extended last fall to run through Dec. 31, 1990.

Attempt to stop trial fails

WASHINGTON — A federal appeals court on Thursday denied a Justice Department attempt to stop Oliver North's Iran-Contra trial on national security grounds. The court agreed with the trial judge that the department lacked authority to intervene.

The ruling came after U.S. District Judge Gerhard A. Gesell had sent the newly picked jury home for the weekend.

The Justice Department had insisted that "highly classified material" might be compromised under pre-trial rules set by Gesell.

In a two-sentence order, the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals dissolved its temporary stay of the proceedings, saying it was denying the department's motion to stop the trial "substantially for the reasons given by" Gesell. He had ruled that the attorney general did not have authority to intervene in the prosecution, which is being handled by independent counsel Lawrence Walsh.

Moose moved to new home

GARDEN CITY — A moose that made news for several weeks as it traveled across southwest Kansas has been returned to an area closer to its natural habitat.

Shor Eisele, a Sublette woman who captured the moose last week to treat it for malnutrition and a parasitic infection, said the animal was released over the weekend on nationally protected land in another state.

Eisele declined to name the state where the moose was taken but said it was released in an isolated area that conforms to its natural habitat.

Students shot in dormitory

HUTCHINSON — Two students were hospitalized Thursday following a shooting incident in a dormitory at Hutchinson Community College.

Marla Boyd, 19, a freshman from Wichita, was in fair condition at Hutchinson Hospital after undergoing surgery for a gunshot wound to the abdomen, said Hutchinson police Detective Loren Snell.

A 21-year-old sophomore from Wichita was in good condition with a wound to the temple. He was being transferred to a Wichita hospital for further observation, Snell said.

The two had been dating, had broken up and then had reconciled, friends told police. Snell said the shootings occurred about 3:30 a.m. in the man's dormitory room.

Boyd was a resident of another HCC dorm.

Police theorized that the man, who was a criminal justice student, shot Boyd and then himself before driving to the hospital.

Souza featured at luncheon

Pete Souza, official White House photographer, will be the guest speaker at an informal luncheon sponsored by the local chapter of Society of Professional Journalists at 1 p.m. today in Union 209.

Souza will discuss some of his most interesting experiences as a White House photographer and present a slide show of his adventures documenting the president's travels.

"The biggest section will be on the Reagan-Gorbachev summit meetings," Souza said. "They are the most interesting because of their historical value."

Souza, who started working for the White House in 1983, graduated from Boston University and attended two years of graduate school at K-State. He worked as a graduate teaching assistant in photography and a Collegian photo editor.

Buy lunch at the Union and take it to room 209 or bring a sack lunch, said Charlie Fair, associate professor in journalism. The luncheon is open to all.

Telefund under way

Half-way mark points to new record

By Brad Camp
Collegian Reporter

From the Pacific Ocean to the Atlantic Ocean, telephones are ringing. On one end of the telephone lines are K-State students, on the other are K-State alumni.

In the Union, 60 telephones and more than 1,200 student and faculty volunteers are calling alumni across the nation as part of the telefund campaign, said Beth Mennelle, assistant director of annual giving at the KSU Foundation.

"K-State has the highest percentage of alumni support in the Big Eight, and that is largely due to telefund," Mennelle said.

Last year the telefund raised about $503,000 from alumni support, said Rusty Andrews, director of annual giving at the KSU Foundation. As of Wednesday, total contributions to this year's telefund were about $281,000, with half of the fund drive still to go.

All of the colleges and the KSU Athletic Department are involved in the telefund, Mennelle said. The deans of each college appoint a faculty adviser to recruit volunteers, and each college's volunteers call alumni from their college.

"We contact about 45,000 to 50,000 alumni," Andrews said. "Last year we had over 16,000 alumni pledge."

The money raised from the telefund goes back into the colleges for scholarships and educational materials, Mennelle said.

"Many students are affected by the telefund, even if they don't realize it," she said. "The telefund is a major fund-raising campaign for scholarships."

The Foundation mails fall and winter requests to all alumni for contributions, Mennelle said. The telefund responds to all alumni who received the mailer but did not contribute.

"Telefund has been going on for about 10 years," she said. "Many people who get called have already participated in telefund themselves. A majority of the alumni are familiar with the telefund, they get called every year and many of them look forward to the students' calls."

Late night events to begin

By Angie Smith
Collegian Reporter

Say, "G'day mate."

The Union Program Council's Late Night Down Under festivities start today. The theme is "Say G'Day!" and the events include fun for everyone, said Mike Penner, UPC adviser and graduate student in student counciling and personal services.

Late Night Down Under events start with comedian Hugh Fink, performing at 7:30 p.m. in the Catskeller. Fink combines his humor and talent as a classical violinist in a unique act, Penner said. Admission for Hugh Fink is $2.

That Statue Moved, a local rock band, will perform following Fink from 10 p.m. to 1 a.m.

"The UPC Special Events committee decided to go with an Australian theme and incorporated it in as many ways as possible, such as free movie rental coupons to Austrailian movies and free bottles of the Austrailian drink, Koala Springs, for prizes," he said.

"Kangaroos drawn on red pieces of paper are scattered throughout the Union and anyone who finds one will get a prize," Penner said.

A Melbourne Market will have booths set for various activities from 7 p.m. to 11 p.m.

The game "Win, Lose, or Draw" will be going on at a booth. Late Night T-shirts will be on sale and committee members will be drawing caricatures, doing face paintings and computer portraits at other booths.

People will also be able to get their pictures taken by a statue of Crocodile Dundee, donated by the Feature Films Committee. The UPC Travel Committee will be selling Valentine's Day balloons.

A booth called Cookin' Down Under, sponsored by Union Food Services, will be selling Valentine's Day cookies, caramel apples and other snacks from 7:30 to 10:30 p.m., Penner said.

Senate begins allocations; group budget requests due

Student Senate

By Steve Logback
Collegian Reporter

The student government 1989-90 allocations process begins today, which is the deadline for filing group budget requests with Student Senate.

Last year, Senate allocated more than $260,000 to student groups and organizations, said Lauren O'Connor, coordinator of finances.

O'Connor said the committee does not yet know the total funds available for next year's allocations, and is waiting for an estimate from Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities.

"It's kind of hard to say how much (money) will be allocated," O'Connor said. "After senators went through the allocation process last year, we ended up allocating money from the reserves. We allocated from the red, in other words. This year, as a committee, we are trying to stay away from that."

Senate's Finance Committee is responsible for reviewing budget requests from student organizations and others making requests for student funds. After a month of review, it then makes recommendations to Senate for the amount of money each group should receive for the fiscal year.

The fiscal year runs July 1 through June 30.

The two-month allocation process starts when each organization requesting student fee allocations receives a request form to fill out and return to the finance committee.

Each group reports the amount of money it received from Senate for the present year and makes three requests for the following year.

O'Connor said the first request is the amount of money the group would ideally like to receive. The second request is a maintenance budget (equal to the current year's level of funding). The third request is for a reduced budget (at least 10 percent below current level of funding).

"We ask them to request very, very specifically and realistically," O'Connor said.

After the forms are returned, the committee schedules a presentation for each group to give to Senate in order to familiarize senators with the group's purpose, goals and plans for the year.

The next step in the process is a budget hearing before the finance committee. This is an opportunity for each group to further explain its reasons for requesting money.

O'Connor said the committee also uses this time to ask the groups any questions it may have. This ensures a thorough and precise evaluation of each organization's request, she said.

Before the funds for the fiscal year are allocated, Senate considers the allocation recommendation from the committee.

Following all committee presentations and Senate debate, senators vote on the total amount of money to be allocated. The groups then know how much money they are tentatively allocated.

Senators may be appointed as liaisons to represent the best interests of the requesting groups to Senate and the committee.

"If the group is unhappy about allocations, the liaisons bring up these discrepancies during Senate discussions," O'Connor said.

Allocations are not finalized until the fall semester. Until then, each group may spend up to 25 percent of its tentative allocation.

Before final allocations are announced in October, a group can appeal its tentative allocation in writing to the committee. New information not known during the tentative allocation process may be presented at that time.

After all appeals are reviewed, the finance committee presents the final allocation bill to Senate.

The bill is read at Senate and each group is voted on separately. If a group is unsatisfied with the amount recommended in the final allocation bill and its appeal was rejected, the group may still persuade a student senator to offer an amendment to the bill.

Once final allocations are approved, the groups are allowed to begin spending their allocation.

Employees endure sudden schedule changes

"It is the policy of Kansas State University to establish working hours consistent with the mission of the University and the efficient management of human resources." — Chapter 5, secton 1, Kansas State University Business Procedures Manual

"Supposedly, you can get more done, which is baloney because you're so tired you don't feel like doing a lot of extra stuff." — custodial worker affected by the recent shift change

Does K-State engage in union busting? How does it treat its workforce? Consider the case of the recent shift change for custodial workers that took effect this semester at four of seven of the complexes and which is ostensibly to improve efficiency. As a result of the change, 32 employees who formerly began work at 6 a.m. now must either work at 4 a.m. or request a transfer to a complex where the change is not in effect.

Can Physical Facilities legally change the shift — even for workers whose contracts specify they will work the 6 a.m. to 3 p.m. shift? Apparently, it can.

Reba Snavely, who was assistant director of facilities at the time of the decision, said it was not a contract violation. She said that with "ample notice," workers' shifts could be changed.

"Ample notice means at least one week in advance, so as not to interrupt the work week and so that workers can adjust their routines to the new time," she said.

But one worker, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said some workers were given little notice.

"We were told one Friday that we would start Monday morning. Then we were told we weren't, and then we were told we were. So that's the advance notice we had. We had one day to think about the decision and after that, we worked."

Stan Findley, chief steward of Chapter 11 of the Kansas Association of Public Employees (KAPE), which is the employees' union, said the union could not change the decision. "Legally, there is not a whole lot we can do about it."

In fact, Findley suggested the change might be part of a larger issue — whether K-State recognizes the right of KAPE to represent employees.

"Some of the people in Physical Facilities didn't think it was necessary for the workers to go to KAPE. We have a contract with the University which makes it perfectly legal for employees to talk to KAPE representatives," Findley said.

Although several people have joined the union since the decision, Findley said a "very low" percentage of the workers — less than 10 percent — belong to the union because they often feel intimidated by their supervisors.

Commentary

Scott Miller

Collegian Columnist

"Generally, we've got a group of people who are afraid to speak up for their rights because they fear the University might retaliate."

He said that after one custodial worker complained to him about the shift change, she was intimidated by her supervisor II.

"I was present and I know they (Physical Facilities personnel and the supervisor) came down on her pretty hard."

Snavely denies that Physical Facilities is opposed to employees talking with the union. She said Findley had based his comments on one isolated case.

Employees have also questioned the motive for the change. Snavely said the change came after custodial workers said they were not getting their work done before classes start.

"We were needing to get into those buildings before 7:30 a.m. That's just not enough time to get the job done. Our workers came to us. They were concerned about getting done before students came into the building," she said.

But Findley said that during a conversation with Snavely, "nothing whatsoever" was mentioned about workers requesting the change. Instead, Snavely supposedly informed Findley that the decision was a response to complaints from faculty members about workers not finishing in time for classes.

Later, Snavely said that although her office had received some complaints from faculty, the decision was primarily made at the request of the workers.

"Sure, we get lots of complaints. That's the nature of our job," she said.

Findley said in most cases the custodial workers had already finished before faculty members arrived.

"I doubt if it was a serious problem. There may have been a few complaints. I think it has more to do with the fact that Physical Facilities is determined to show it has the power and authority to do what it damn well pleases. I think this is one reason these people feel intimidated."

One worker said, "If we could get them to listen to reason, (they would understand) that we can get our classrooms done, that we always have except when it snows, and no one gets the classrooms done when it snows."

Despite a wage increase for those working the new shift, one worker said it is not worth it. She said it was difficult to find child care at 4 a.m.

"No, most aren't happy with the change, because it's so hard to get used to going to sleep so early and then getting up so early. You don't get to see your family. If you do, you're so tired, you can't enjoy seeing them," she said.

Snavely, however, said the change was totally voluntary. She said there is already a waiting list of employees who want to work the earlier shift. "If they want out, we can find new positions for them."

But asked if workers had requested the change, one said, "No. We were told we either worked it, or we were moved to a different building."

Findley said that while some workers are happy with the shift, others have no choice but to change to another complex.

"I don't think there's a groundswell among the workers in favor of the shift change," he said.

Although the union cannot reverse the change, it is presently in contract negotiations with the University. For the time being, however, there appears to be little democracy in the workplace for K-State custodial workers.

Rezoning proposal beneficial to K-State

For the second time in as many months, the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board has chosen to reject a rezoning proposal that would allow a student-oriented apartment complex to be built at the northwest corner of Kimball and College avenues.

The first time this project was denied was in December. The problems cited then included that the plan would be the only high-density complex in a low-density area and that the land-use plan for the area needed to be updated before any building took place.

City Planner Eric Cattell presented a revised proposal to the board on Monday that addressed those concerns, including reducing the number of buildings and units, creating an open field recreation area, and increasing the total green space to 39 percent when before there had been none.

The need for new student housing in Manhattan is a present problem, especially with the increased enrollment at K-State. The city planner has recognized that need and apparently now must plead to be allowed to address that need.

Cattell has made more than a strong attempt to compromise to meet the original concerns of the public as well as the board. Now it's time for others to compromise as well.

The proposal will go before the Manhattan City Commission in February. Despite the original negative reaction of the board, perhaps the city will recognize the need for increased housing, realize the potential for Manhattan development, and approve the rezoning plan.

Pranks mark K-State history

Have you ever wondered what the K-State campus must have been like in the good ol' days? You know, what were the students like, what buildings were here, etc. And have you ever ventured into the dark recesses of the Farrell Library stacks and thumbed through old yearbooks to find out?

Of course you haven't, because you have a real life to live. But luckily for you, I don't. So the other day, I did just that. I pulled out the old Kansas State Agricultural College class of 1900 yearbook, titled "The Sledge," and acquired a bit of insight into K-State at the turn of the century.

A revealing peek into the class of 1900 comes from the "Class Statistics."

Of the 58 seniors, 36 studied general courses, 9 studied agriculture, 8 studied domestic science, and 5 studied engineering.

Not much has changed in the area of politics, as we learn that 25 considered themselves Republicans and 19 were Populists.

Under "Complexion," we find there were 38 brunettes, 13 blondes, and 4 strawberry blondes. The most widespread habit in the senior class was card playing — 16 — while two used tobacco and two had reformed.

Other informative statistics include Residence ("city" or "country"), Vocations (past and prospective), Height, Weight, and Size of Shoes (all including max., min., average, and total).

On athletics, we are told it "has not ... attracted as much interest within the college as it should, but the attention is constantly being turned more and more to the subject." KSAC men fielded teams in "foot-ball, base ball, and golf."

And "the ladies of our college are not entirely overlooked in providing for athletic sports." From their calisthenics instructor, the ladies learned "basket ball" (not yet a man's sport), hare and hound chase, and lawn tennis.

The campus of 1900 consisted of only a few buildings: the Main Building (Anderson Hall), the Library and Agricultural Science

Commentary

Doug Folk

Collegian Columnist

Hall (Fairchild Hall), the Shops (a part of Seaton Hall), the Chemical Laboratory (Holtz Hall — which was gutted by fire that year), the Domestic Science Hall (Kedzie Hall), and a new Agricultural Hall.

Then, as now, a tall smokestack, or "chimney," towered over the campus. Another prominent fixture as the "Old College Pump," an iron pump near the Chemical Laboratory which provided water for thirsty students.

Some of the slang phrases of the day, as reported by the class "fool," included "Jehosephat," "by grub," "gee whiz," "by jinks," "great mud turtles," "I'll bet a calf," and "get out."

Then, as now, professors had their characteristic expressions, such as "That's the point, young gentlemen," "according to general rules," "I must say," and "we will now demonstrate."

Probably the strongest impression one gets of the students of that era is that they were quite the pranksters. In fact, much of the yearbook space is devoted to chronicling the rivalry that existed between the juniors and the seniors, and the misadventures that accompanied it.

One story is told of the seniors' plan to hang their numbers, "00," from the smokestack. Despite their secrecy, the seniors were ambushed by those mischievous juniors, who were promptly rewarded for their intrusion by being tied up and left face up in the rainy night.

Informed of these happenings by the "kind-hearted, smiling old janitor," the president, or "prex" as he was called, felt it necessary to call in deputy marshals from Topeka to guard the smokestack.

We are told the best tale via a poem titled "To the Stars Through Difficulties." In six pages of verse, we learn how the senior class decided to purchase a cornerstone engraved with "Class of 1900" for the new Agricultural Hall, and the trials and tribulations they overcame to achieve this goal.

It seems that after its construction, the despised juniors purloined the stone from Mr. Paddock's marble works, after which they buried it in a distant barn. The distraught seniors tracked falsely planted wagon tracks to the Blue River, where "through torrents of rain, in a leaky boat, with a ten-foot pole on the river afloat," seniors Derr, Hanson, and Bliss searched in vain for the lost stone.

The frustrated seniors then hired a lawyer, who frightened the juniors into revealing where the stone was hidden. Alas, as the juniors attempted to dig the stone from its grave, it split in two and was ruined. At this point, the juniors were forced to repay the seniors the full cost of the stone, $30.

But the juniors hadn't learned their lesson. A new stone was constructed, and lay under guard near the new building. But the guards were ambushed, and the pesky juniors smashed the stone with a sledge-hammer, and smeared it with tar.

Angry though they were, the seniors, in the end, displayed the true spirit of their school. Threatened with suspension, the juniors were saved only by the pleas of the seniors, and a promise to "be good."

Agricultural Hall, incidentally, is now called Holton Hall. And the fabled stone is still clearly visible on the southwest corner of the building, a reminder of the year of its construction, and of the place of the graduating class of 1900 in the annals of K-State history.

Collegian Editorial Policies

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR are always encouraged. Those which pertain to matters of campus and/or public interest are especially encouraged, and are given the highest priority.

Letters should be kept as brief as possible, preferably under 300 words. Those who cannot condense their opinions should consider submiting their letter in the form of a guest column. All letters are subject to editing for space, style and taste.

GUEST COLUMNS are also encouraged. The column should be no longer than two double-spaced, typed pages. If the submission is used as a column and not a letter to the editor, it will be accompanied by the author's photograph.

K-State needs positive attitude

Commentary

Nick Master
Guest Columnist

How far have we come? What can I do to help on campus? Are we moving in the right direction? Who will follow through when we're gone?

These are a few of the questions we do not ask ourselves often enough.

After having been associated with this school for many years, I believe we have an inherent, almost institutional, second-class self-image of ourselves. However, in recent years, I feel this self-image quagmire has begun to crack.

Many efforts to slow this unproductive attitude began at the top, specifically with President Jon Wefald. The notion of "what's good for Kansas is good for Kansas State" has been redirected to "what's good for Kansas State is good for Kansas." The Office of the President and corresponding offices throughout Anderson Hall should be commended on attacking growth aggressively instead of accepting the status quo as policy.

By no means has K-State arrived, thus I would be concerned if we sat back on our butts and accepted little changes as the sum total of success.

One thorn in our side has been an unnecessary preoccupation with KU.

It seems to me that students, even more than faculty, gauge our daily existence with that of what KU is doing. Comparison for comparison's sake has some merit, but a preoccupation with KU impedes our internal focus.

Birds will always be birds. They are prey for cats and don't stand a chance against feline instincts. Now that this is established, endlessly comparing our athletic teams, curriculums and the like to other schools in different situations doesn't solve much at all.

And who cares what Yalies think! From administrators to students, collectively we must focus and fight aggressively for programs that will benefit K-State — particularly in dollars, via service to Kansas, the region, the nation and the globe.

If we desire to be the pinnacle of complete success, then we must target the market and assault it.

Campus coordination and communication has to be clear and uncluttered. I believe if we prevent ourselves from forming committees, we could end needless bureaucratic delays.

What we do on campus is equal to our actions off of campus. The ultimate contribution a K-State student can do is to tell their friends at home about the University and recruit them.

Once here, the administration, faculty, and staff can involve themselves in a personalized manner with the retention and promotion of these students.

By having a willingness to contribute all we can, there will not be time to compare ourselves with KU. They'll be doing that to us. By giving your time and efforts we will blow other universities away.

Because the financial pie isn't big enough, our representatives have to fight for every fund imaginable. I think it's a shame the regents could not get off their butts and designate K-State as THE engineering school of Kansas. Instead, they want to fund everyone else to catch up with us.

In that case, I demand $100 million immediately for Farrell Library and department libraries. As you can see, some institutional bodies are at times favorable to our competition.

In order to attain higher levels, we have to be better, brighter and more determined in order to change the sleep habits of bodies, such as the Board of Regents. By participating in the functions of this school we can give the regents the backbone they don't have.

The pride of being at K-State is too precious to ignore. Purple is OUR color. Let's flood it from games to shopping malls. Count yourself in and never count yourself out. You should recognize that your school is calling. Did you know a bumper sticker will be seen by 7,000 people each year? My car has two of them; I hope your's has one, too.

Editor,

On Feb. 2, the Collegian featured a photograph of Professor James Boyer viewing a satellite program commemorating Black History month.

The photo showed Boyer alone in Frick Auditorium, which is equipped to seat 270 people, looking up at four television monitors reading "Black Power."

Is this photo symbolic of the loneliness of blacks on this campus, or are other people in the auditorium and the photography staff just chose to depict the situation in this manner?

I think these are important questions to seek clarification on.

Thanks for support

Editor,

My deepest thanks to everyone at K-State who helped contribute to the Flint Hills Bread Basket during the holiday season. Your support was wonderful.

It resulted in a total of 66,000 pounds of food being collected and distributed to 1,162 families. Included in the families served were 2,000 children.

Helping to distribute the Thanksgiving and Christmas baskets was a heartwarming activity. I wish each one who donated to the food drive could have seen the smiles as the food was given out.

My special thanks to the Order of Omega and ICAT organizations. Without your support, we could not have done it.

Academic freedom

Editor,

I remember that one of my first assignments as a student newspaper reporter some years ago was to cover a meeting of the local chapter of the American Association of University Professors.

The president of that university had just won the AAUP's Meiklejohn Award for contributions to academic freedom, and the phrase "academic freedom and tenure" was almost a palpable presence on that campus (this was not at K-State).

With this background, I was disappointed with the recent Collegian story on tenure. Your story focused exclusively on tenure and completely neglected the other side of the coin: academic freedom.

The whole point of tenure, as I have always understood it, is that it is a means of assuring academic freedom. A tenured professor may teach and conduct research without fearing his or her job will be jeopardized by popular opinion that does not approve of the ideas the professor uses in teaching or in publication.

Perhaps we feel so enlightened these days and so tolerant, that the idea of academic freedom is quaint and old-fashioned. But, again as a student reporter, in a midwestern state sometimes thought of as enlightened in its attitude toward higher education, I reported on threats in the state legislature against some unnamed professor at my university who was teaching — gasp! — civil disobediance.

Without the protection of tenure, any professor who talks about some of the most powerful ideas in history, like civil disobedience, communist economic theory and even evolution, runs a very real risk of being fired for thinking and speaking freely.

Academic freedom is absolutely essential for the open interchange of ideas and untrammelled play of curiosity that characterizes a university. Tenure is the coin with which this freedom is purchased.

Those who are uncomfortable with tenure should ask themselves if they are also uncomfortable with the free exchange of ideas.

Guns easy target

Editor,

In regard to the Jan. 24 commentary about gun control: Can't you find an easier target than the NRA and lawful gun owners? This kind of newspaper crucifixion occurs whenever a tragedy happens that involves a firearm. The public must find a large scapegoat in the gun and not the psychopathic killer who kills for pleasure.

I would also like to ask you to be objective in your reporting. Consulting "Soldier of Fortune" is not exactly the most reliable view of the responsible gun owner. If you wanted a reliable view, you could have called the NRA. I am sure they would have given you the opinion of law-abiding gun owners, not the view of the people who enjoy killing (or think they do) or of the readers who believe the stories in those magazines.

As I sit and read all of the anti-gun sentiment in the paper, I am reminded of a bumper sticker that said, "If guns are outlawed, only outlaws will have guns."

It is a cliche, but it is so true.

Nazi propaganda

Editor,

Those eight Nazis marching in Atlanta recently do not represent white people, although they claim they do.

What they represent is the concept of supremacy — the idea that one race or class has the right to subjugate all others. Nothing could be more anti-American or anti-Christian, but these creeps pretend patriotism and religion in spreading their propaganda.

Maybe we need to prepare our children in school to resist Nazi propaganda, as we taught our children to resist communist propaganda when I was in school.

All across America, racist propaganda is inciting violence. Young people, frustrated with their lives, are prime targets for the pushers of hate.

In two years, the Skinhead movement has grown from 600 to 6,000 members. At that rate, there could be 600,000 Nazi Skinheads loose in America by the time of the next presidential election. And there are many other neo-Nazi groups, all armed and dedicated to bringing about what they call "The Storm."

Patrick E. Purdy, who killed five Asian children and wounded 30 other people in a school yard in California, had propaganda from the Aryan Nations on him when he was previously arrested in April 1987.

In Portland, Ore., three young Skinheads face murder charges for the November beating death of an Ethiopian emigrant.

On Jan. 12, a judge in Texas said, "It's not illegal to hate, but is is illegal to act on that hate," when he sentenced Daniel Wood, 19, to 10 years in jail. Daniel Wood is a Skinhead and a Ku Klux Klan member. Daniel Wood is a kid who got hooked on Nazi propaganda, and now his life is ruined.

It's against God's law to hate. We must find the courage to stand up and stop terrorism here at home, for the sake of the children being pulled into the evil army of racism and for the sake of our own domestic peace and prosperity. If we don't, our streets may soon be as bloody as the streets of Beirut.

Academic tenure

Editor,

There was apparently an unfortunate misunderstanding of a statement by Arts and Sciences Dean Thomas Isenhour regarding academic tenure.

Academic tenure originated long before the civil rights movement. In the 1969 handbook titled "Policy Documents, and Reports of the American Association of University Professors (AAUP)," the statement on academic freedom and tenure begins as follows.

"In 1940, following a series of joint conferences begun in 1934, representatives of the American Association of University Professors and of the Association of American Colleges agreed upon a restatement of principles set forth in the 1925 Conference Statement on Academic Freedom and Tenure."

As that sentence points out, the principles of academic freedom and tenure were codified by 1925. We can safely assume that discussion of those principles had gone on for several years before that time and that at least in some institutions rules for academic freedom and tenure were already in place.

The AAUP is pleased to see a discussion of academic freedom and tenure in the Collegian. It is very important to point out that tenure exists to protect academic freedom and is not meant to protect incompetence.

Also keep in mind that most large organizations have rules that make it difficult to fire a long-term employee. The reason is fairly obvious.

A long-term employee who has given satisfactory service should not be in the position of having his or her position jeopardized at the whim of the employer. Rather, the burden of proof should be with the employer to demonstrate that the employee is no longer performing in a satisfactory manner.

Chicago concert announced

By The Collegian Staff

The 20-year-old rock group Chicago, whose distinctive sound has been captured on 19 albums, will perform at 8 p.m. Sunday, April 2, in Bramlage Coliseum, said Charlie Thomas, Coliseum director.

Chicago's most recent album, "19," included the group's first No. 1 hit in four years, "Look Away." Another single, "I Don't Wanna Live Without Your Love," made it to the Top 10. "You're Not Alone," the group's most recent release, is moving up the charts quickly and was the most added single at radio stations across the United States for the last full week of January.

Thomas said Bramlage officials were able to secure the group's appearance because Chicago's tour takes them through the Midwest.

"It's whatever is routing through the area. We can't just say 'we want Huey Lewis,' and get him in concert if he's playing on the West Coast," he said.

The eight-member group went through a major readjustment in 1986 when lead singer Peter Cetera left the band to pursue his own career. Bill Champlin, whose credits include co-composing hit songs for Earth, Wind And Fire and George Benson, now sings lead vocals for the group.

Thomas said the profits from the Chicago concert will not offset the losses from the cancellation last month of the rock group Metallica, which was scheduled to perform at the end of January.

"That will take a few shows," he said.

Tickets, which will cost $16 plus a service charge, will go on sale Monday, Feb. 20. They will be available at the Coliseum box office; Middle Earth Records, Junction City; Mother Earth Records, Topeka; and the ITR office, Ft. Riley.

Cockpit recorder found in plane crash

By The Associated Press

VILA DO PORTO, Azores Islands — Authorities on Thursday found the cockpit voice recorder of a chartered U.S. jetliner that slammed into a mountain and killed all 144 people aboard, and they recovered the remains of all but two of the dead.

Rescuers called off the search for the two bodies still missing, saying it would be impossible to find them on the heavily forested slopes of Pico Alto mountain where the jet crashed Wednesday.

Antonio Alves of the Civilian Aviation Authority said it was hoped the recorder would help explain why the pilot steered the Boeing 707 directly into the mountain while trying to land in fog. The seven-member American crew and the 137 passengers — Italian tourists headed across the Atlantic to a Caribbean vacation — were killed.

In Lisbon, Cmdr. Jose Pastor of the aviation authority said the pilot, Capt. Leon Daugherty, had acknowledged the airport control tower's authorization of a safety altitude of 3,000 feet during the landing approach.

Pastor said the plane struck the mountain at an altitude of about 1,700 feet.

"There was no — repeat no — communication of an emergency landing request by the pilot," he said. Earlier reports indicated the pilot may have asked to make an emergency landing.

Alves said it appeared the aircraft had been on the proper course to land. It was to refuel on Santa Maria island before continuing on to the Dominican Republic.

Alves said the cockpit voice recorder had been recovered, but the flight data recorder, which contains information on the aircraft's flight parameters, had not yet been found.

The jet was owned by Independent Air Corp. of Smyrna Tenn., which was expected to send representatives to Lisbon for talks.

Bands to perform tonight

By Karla Redelsheimer
Arts and Entertainment Editor

Alternative music fans who often find themselves listening to music alone, will have the opportunity to listen to four live underground music acts Saturday night at Charlie's Party Dome in Aggieville.

Jeff Peterson, senior in radio and television and non-profit promoter for the show, said two of the acts, the band The Moving Van Gogh's and folk singer Jeb Bolan, are from Manhattan. The bands Thirteen Nightmares out of Lincoln, Neb. and The Flaming Lips of Norman, Okla. will also be playing.

The Flaming Lips, a band familiar to most college alternative audiences, consists of three members: Wayne Coyne, Michael Ivins and Richard English. The trio travels without a sound man or roadies and are responsible for their own light show run with foot pedals, Peterson said.

"Their sound is what Peter, Paul and Mary would sound like with a distortion pedal," he said. "They'll play a very soft, melodic soothing song like "Water," then rip into something like Kiss' "Destroyer." They're very bizarre, but very talented."

The show will start at 8 p.m. with an admission of $5. The money will go to the bands and will cover overhead costs of building rental and sound equipment, Peterson said.

Underground bands, he said, are noncorporate bands that play original music for fun and have no select musical style.

"The reason I'm (a) non-profit (promoter) is there are tremendous underground bands that get little or no air play," Peterson said. "I benefit by being able to see live music that I truly enjoy."

Peterson tries to put shows together about once a month, he said. The last show, which was in January, drew a crowd of 290 listeners.

The purpose of the shows, Peterson said, is to entertain people who enjoy alternative music. People can come together in a friendly atmosphere, listen to their favorite music and meet others with common music tastes.

Peterson has planned another show for Monday, Feb. 27. It will feature the bands Soul Side from Washington, D.C.; Two Car Family from Lawrence; and Rabid Fetus from Lindsborg.

K-State reserves spark victory

Diggins, Britt, Massop help lift 'Cats, 104-89

Staff/Steve Wolgast

Iowa State's Victor Alexander (52) competes for a rebound with K-State's Fred McCoy and Lance Simmons. K-State's win was the first 100-plus victory since Jan. 12, 1987.

By Mike Goens
Sports Writer

K-State turned to some old, yet familiar faces in its 104-89 rout of Iowa State Thursday.

Led by Tony Massop, Reggie Britt and Carlos Diggins, who were all starters at one time this season, K-State got 36 points from its reserves. Massop had 11 points while Britt and Diggins each had nine.

"I was proud of the way several of our players stepped up," K-State coach Lon Kruger said. "I was happy for them because they worked real hard. Anytime you can get more balance and have people stepping forward and contributing at key times it is a real asset."

Britt perhaps put the ballgame away with 6:28 to play with a thunderous slam that gave K-State an 87-73 lead.

Britt had Fred McCoy with him on a 2-on-1 break against the Cyclone's massive center, Victor Alexander, and decided to take care of business himself.

"I saw him (Alexander)," Britt said. "He was leaning one way so I kept going."

The dunk started a run of six straight points by K-State. Diggins followed with a driving layup and Massop hit a five-footer in the lane for a 91-73 Wildcat lead.

All that was left to be determined was if the 'Cats would get what K-State fans have waited more than two years for — the century mark. It came with 1:13 to play, when LaKeith Humphrey hit the first of two free throws for a 100-83 lead. It was the first 100-point game for K-State since Jan. 12, 1987, when they hit 114 against Nebraska.

K-State used a 20-6 run early in the second half to break open a 53-53 tie.

A 10-2 run was highlighted by Massop scoring the last six points on back-to-back, three-point plays, giving the 'Cats a 63-55 lead with 14:35 to play.

After Iowa State pulled to within five at 64-59, K-State proceeded to score nine straight points with 15-foot jumpers from Britt, Billy Ray Smith and Humphrey, before Mark Dobbins ended the run with a 21-foot three-pointer that put the 'Cats up 73-59.

"Iowa State fought hard and dictated much of the first half," Kruger said. "We felt like we were on our heels. They pushed the ball down. We didn't get our defense set. At the half we talked about picking up defensively and not letting them do what they wanted to do."

Britt said he was motivated to play after not playing last weekend against Missouri.

"The last few days in practice I have felt confident," he said. "I was just trying to get it to carry over.

"Coach has been on me a lot lately. It was gut-check time more than anything else. That was my incentive. To come close isn't going to get the job done. I had to bounce back and play harder. I was excited to be out there."

"Reggie plays with a lot of emotion," Kruger said. "He wasn't letting it go. He earned the opportunity to play tonight. He's back for the stretch."

Steve Henson led the balanced Wildcat attack with 19 points, followed by McCoy with 18 and Humphrey with 17.

"I was proud of the way several of our players stepped up. I was happy for them because they worked real hard."

— Lon Kruger men's basketball coach

Led by Alexander with 25 and Terry Woods with 18, Iowa State had five players in double figures.

"Tony did a good job on Alexander," Kruger said. "We got him out on the floor and got some help on the off-side. We worked hard defensively.

Iowa State led for much of the first half and even held a 37-29 lead with 5:40 to play, but K-State made an 8-0 run during the next two minutes to tie the game at 37-37. Dobbins hit a three-pointer and made a steal for a Diggins layup and Diggins followed with a three-pointer to draw the Wildcats even. Humphrey hit a three-pointer with four seconds left in the first half to put K-State ahead, 49-46, at the intermission.

Nebraska to visit Bramlage

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

K-State men's basketball team will barely have time to savor its 104-89 Thursday night victory over Iowa State before it has to turn around and face the Cornhuskers of Nebraska in a 12:10 p.m. tipoff at Bramlage Coliseum on Saturday.

"We're very concerned, not physically as much as mentally, about bouncing back and playing 36 hours from now," Wildcat coach Lon Kruger said Thursday night. "Twelve o'clock Saturday is going to come very quickly.

"I told the players to go say hello to their friends and then we'll watch tapes here at 10:45 p.m. (Thursday). They'll only be able to enjoy this one for about 30 more minutes and then we start looking at Nebraska stuff."

Nebraska, 13-10 overall and 1-6 in the Big Eight Conference, beat Kansas, 74-70, Saturday, but then was dumped, 83-80, by the Colorado Buffaloes Wednesday.

The Wildcats, 13-7 overall and 4-4 in the conference, dropped a close game, 68-73, to third ranked conference foe Missouri at Columbia, before they bounced back to beat the Cyclones.

In the two schools' last meeting in Lincoln, the 'Cats put together a 16-4 run late in the game to upend the Huskers, 80-68.

K-State's reserves played a key role in the Iowa State game, contributing 36 points, and could do the same against Nebraska.

"It was definitely one of the better ones (games for our bench)," Kruger said. "No other one comes to mind that would top this one, especially in contributions in real key parts of the game. I don't think there has been any other game where four or five guys have stepped up.

"Our depth really showed. Maybe Iowa State got a little fatigued. Obviously it makes a big difference when you play nine or 10 people."

Lady Cats looking to start new win streak at Lincoln

By Mike Rouse
Collegian Reporter

K-State's women's basketball team will continue to look for its first sweep of a Big Eight team since the 1986-87 season when it travels to Nebraska for a 7:30 tipoff Saturday night against the Lady Huskers at Bob Devaney Sports Center.

The Lady Cats were denied a sweep over Iowa State Wednesday night when the Cyclones defeated the Lady Cats in overtime, 83-75.

"Ames (Iowa) is a tough place to play," K-State coach Matilda Mossman said. "Iowa State played real well against us."

K-State, 16-6 overall and 6-3 in the Big Eight, was able to defeat the Lady Huskers when the two teams met in Bramlage Coliseum Jan. 21.

The Lady Cats are in the middle of a three-game road trip that will end Wednesday night against league-leading Colorado.

"We looked at this part of the schedule and knew it wasn't going to be easy," she said.

In the last two games, the Lady Cats have had two different players come off the bench and contribute when a starter was struggling. Against Missouri, reserve center Stephanie Lane scored a career-high 15 points and against Iowa State, Stacey Boyle scored nine.

The loss to the Lady Cyclones snapped a five-game winning streak by the Lady Cats. The team's last loss before the streak started was an 82-75 decision at Missouri on Jan. 18. The Lady Cats also failed to continue a six-game streak in which at least four players had scored in double figures.

K-State still has three starters averaging in double figures. Nadira Hazim is averaging 14.5 points a game, while Diana Miller is averaging 12.5 points and Kristie Bahner, 11.6 points. The Lady Cats' other two starters, Mary Jo Miller and Rita Matteucci, are averaging 9.8 and 9.2 points a game, respectively.

Nebraska, 12-10 overall and 3-6 in the Big Eight, is coming off an 85-76 victory over Oklahoma on Wednesday night. Amy Stephens scored 40 points in the Cornhusker win.

Stephens is the Cornhuskers' leading scorer, averaging 21.7 points a game. Kim Harris is the teams leading rebounder, averaging 7.3 rebounds a game on top of her 12.9 points. Ann Halsne is averaging 10.3 points, but in the Lady Cats' first meeting with Nebraska she poured in a career-high 29 points.

"We have to play better defensively against Nebraska," Mossman said. "We also have to contain Amy Stephens."

Probable Starters

Lady Cats (16-6)	Pos.	Nebraska (12-10)
Bahner(5-11, So.)	F	Halsne(6-1, So.)
D.Miller(5-10, So.)	F	Taylor(6-0, Jr.)
Matteucci(5-11, Jr.)	C	Harris(6-1, Sr.)
Hazim(5-7, So.)	G	Stephens(5-8, Sr.)

Track teams at Husker meet

From Staff and Wire Reports

The men's and women's indoor track teams will travel to Lincoln today for the second weekend in a row to compete in the Husker Invitational at Nebraska.

Coach John Capriotti said the meet, which will run both today and Saturday, has drawn some good team competition.

"The competition will be very tough in every event," Capriotti said. "We're looking to improve on individual performances and hope to pick up a few more national qualifiers."

The women's division will feature four of last year's top five teams in the nation — Texas, the defending national champions; Alabama; Southern California; and Nebraska, last year's Big Eight indoor champions.

Some of the top squads on the men's side will be Manhattan (N.Y.) College, North Carolina, Virginia and Nebraska, also the defending Big Eight indoor champions.

Jeff Reynolds, defending Big Eight 600-yard champion, will see his first action of the season. Reynolds will anchor the 1600-meter relay team, which Capriotti expects to do quite well.

Besides K-State and Nebraska, four other Big Eight schools will be competing — Iowa State, Missouri and Kansas.

"This will give us a chance to see how we stack up against them," Capriotti said.

Both the K-State men and women experienced a decent all-around meet last weekend, said Capriotti, who was especially pleased with Connie Teaberry's performance in the high jump. Teaberry qualified for the NCAA Indoor Championships with a leap of 5-11¼ .

Including Teaberry, K-State now boasts four national qualifiers. The other three are Ray Hill in the 55-meters, Dan O'Mara in the shot put and Kim Kilpatrick in the 55-meter hurdles.

Tennis team to duel Texas Tech at Topeka's Wood Valley courts

By Carolyn Holcroft
Sports Writer

K-State's women's tennis team will compete in its first regular dual match of the season at 1 p.m. Saturday against Texas Tech at the Wood Valley Racquet Club in Topeka.

Unlike last weekend's tournament, which consisted of only doubles matches, this weekend's play will include six singles and three doubles sets, each counting as one point. The first team to accumulate five points will win the match.

Tennis coach Steve Bietau said the Texas Tech meet will provide more competition than was present in last week's KSU Doubles Invitational.

"Texas Tech is a Southwest Conference team, and it's a very strong conference," he said. "They match up with us real closely. I think that where we're strong, they're strong."

Bietau said Texas Tech has much team depth with not much of a difference in skill levels between the No. 1 and lower positioned players. He said the team positions are almost interchangable.

But K-State demonstrated its own depth last weekend as two of its doubles teams wound up playing each other in the finals of the doubles tourney Division II. Bietau said K-State's team was not as competitive the last time they faced Texas Tech.

"We've played them once before, about two years ago, and at that time they were a lot stronger than we were," he said.

This week Bietau has been working primarily on establishing a singles lineup in practice, but hasn't reached any concrete decisions, he said. He added that competition for postitions is extremely stiff.

"Most of the sets in practice have been very close," Bietau said. "Mistee Bitner is starting to become more of a factor at singles which makes it a tougher decision for me, but also makes us stronger as a team."

The exact starting order won't be decided until April, when players must compete in a consistant position in order to be eligible to be seeded in the Big Eight tournament. Bietau said he may rotate and test players at different spots even up through spring break.

"We'll try to finalize it as soon as we can, but we also like to keep the door open," he said. "The competition is something we try to use to keep the players working hard and fighting for their spot."

Expected teams for doubles competition this weekend are Helen Schildknecht and Miste Bitner, Valerie Rive and Marijke Nel, and Sara Hancock with Thresa Burcham.

Ulcer sidelines MU's Stewart; OU dumps Missouri, 112-105

By The Associated Press

NORMAN, Okla. — Missouri coach Norm Stewart, hospitalized with a bleeding ulcer, called his players and fill-in assistant coach Rich Daly minutes before No. 3 Missouri played Oklahoma.

His pep talk worked for a while, but didn't hold up down the stretch as the fifth-ranked Sooners pulled away 112-105 Thursday night.

For Daly, coaching his first college game since he was head coach at Pensacola Junior College in the mid-1970s, he didn't have time to be nervous.

And after the game, the outcome seemed immaterial.

"I don't think the players or the staff had a chance to be nervous," Daly said. "When you've been through something like this (Stewart's illness), the rest is easy."

Oklahoma coach Billy Tubbs agreed.

"I really felt the game was immaterial and small considering what Norm is going through now," Tubbs said. "But Rich did a great job."

Daly was called into action after Stewart blacked out Thursday morning on the team's flight to Norman.

"I'll tell you what. I'm going to take a CPR course when I get back," Daly said. "It was the longest eight minutes of my life (waiting for the plane to land).

"After that, the rest of the day was easy. We shot around, ate and played the game."

"Coach Daly did great, and I expected it out of him," said freshman guard Anthony Peeler. "This has really been one of those weeks."

ernment go to a two-year budget process, rather than one year, and asked, as did Reagan before him, for the power for a line-item veto. Bush's first presidential speech mixed campaign promises with expressions of budget restraint and new overtures toward bipartisanship.

Initial reaction from congressional leaders was cordial. "The Democratic Congress wants to work with this president in every way that we can," House Speaker Jim Wright, D-Texas, said in a taped response to Bush's speech.

"We'll give him our sincere cooperation. That does not mean obedience. It does mean our honest help and our very best advice," Wright said.

Bush reiterated a vow from his inaugural address to extend a hand to Congress. "My team and I are ready to work with the Congress, to form a special leadership group, to negotiate in good faith, to work night and day — if that's what it takes — to meet the budget targets and to produce a budget on time."

Among Bush's major proposals were:

■ An increase in funding for the space program of $2.4 billion over the current year.

■ Indefinite postponement of three oil drilling leases "which have raised troubling questions," two off the coast of California and one in Florida "which could threaten the Everglades."

■ A $1,000-per child tax credit for low-income families and a $3,000 deduction to help defer the cost of adoptions.

■ The first installment toward $500 million in grants for the nation's best schools, rewards for teachers, and an expansion of the Head Start program.

"I have said I'd like to be 'the education president.' Tonight, I ask you to join me by becoming 'the education Congress,'" he said.

Bush devoted the bulk of his speech to domestic issues, talking about the expanded programs he had promised during his campaign.

environment, on social programs."

Megna pointed out that although he called himself the "education president," Bush called for four times as much money to be spent on space programs as on education.

Bush recommended $500 million be spent on an education program; his proposal for a space development program was $2.4 billion.

"He's saying he'll do a lot for education, but he's not willing to put money into it," Megna said.

To increase long-term investment, Bush recommended a cut in the maximum tax rate on capital gains, saying it would increase revenues, help savings and create new jobs.

Gustafson said this is "inconsistent" with what Bush said several years ago.

"Back in 1980 he called (tax rate cuts on capital gains) 'voodoo economics'. Now he's advocating it," Gustafson said. "(Bush is) arguing the trickle down effect — that's what he called 'voodoo economics.'"

Megna also said Bush was "going in the opposite direction."

In 1986, Bush supported the elimination of special treatment of capital gains to lower income tax rates. Megna said Bush's call to cut the minimum tax rate will not increase revenue.

Wendell Hoffman, Manhattan, was in Mississippi in 1964 working for CBS News recording the actual events recently portrayed in the film, "Mississippi Burning." Recollections of Mississippi burning

By Angie Smith
Collegian Reporter

Wendell Hoffman credits the media for playing an important role in the success of the civil rights movement.

"We changed this country," Hoffman said about those in and reporting on the civil rights movement.

Hoffman, a Manhattan resident, recorded the incidents on which the movie "Mississippi Burning" is based when he was a CBS sound film photojournalist.

Hoffman, 76, took film footage for CBS during the FBI investigation into the 1964 disappearance of three civil rights workers near Philidelphia, Miss. Hoffman also filmed many of the civil rights marches, and the outbreaks of violence that accompanied the marches.

Television made the civil rights movement, Hoffman said.

"As long as people don't have to look at it, nothing will get done about it," he said. "But, when you start showing the murders, the lynching, the homeless, something gets done about it."

Hoffman would stay in a hotel in Jackson, Miss. while covering the incidents in Philidelphia. He remembers many times getting police escorts out of Mississippi.

"Some of the people against the civil rights movement would try to run into us or cause us to wreck," Hoffman said.

Hoffman described "Mississippi Burning" as being accurate overall.

"It's a hell of a movie and to me, it's just like it was yesterday," Hoffman said. "Parts of the show are exaggerated, but many of incidents actually happened."

"I think the local FBI were sympathetic to the college kids, but I don't think they were going out of their way to help the civil rights movement, just simply enforcing the law," he said.

"I thought the college kids had every right and were doing a good thing by coming to Mississippi and helping the blacks register (to vote)," Hoffman said.

In the movie, the car driven by three young men who have disappeared is found in a swamp. Hoffman said he was at the scene "in minutes" after the burned car was discovered on a dirt road outside of Philidelphia, Miss.

Hoffman remembers that many in the community knew that the Ku Klux Klan had killed the three men, and as depicted in the movie, people laughed when the FBI towed the car away.

"The deaths of the three boys were a big joke to the community."

"Mississippi Burning" also gives the viewer the impression that the KKK burned down every church in and around Philidelphia.

"Many churches were burned down, but I think the producer compresses everything that was going on in the entire state in two hours," he said. "It didn't happen that way.

"At the time all this was happening, I heard there was a $30,000 reward for anyone who would tell the FBI where the missing bodies were," Hoffman said. "In the movie, the FBI gets the information from a sheriff's wife. I would love to ask the producer where he got his facts as to how the FBI found the bodies."

In 1957, Hoffman went to Cuba and was the first to take pictures of and write about Fidel Castro, president of Cuba. He also was one of the journalists who went along with first lady Jacqueline Kennedy on a trip to India.

"I've led an interesting life," He said.

Hoffman took Dan Rather, now a CBS anchorman, on his first network news story and was also working with Rather in Dallas when President John F. Kennedy was assassinated.

While working with Bill Plante, recently a CBS White House correspondent, both men covered the disappearance of the three civil rights workers in the film "Mississippi Burning."

"The civil rights struggle went on for ten years. It was the biggest domestic story at the time," Hoffman said. "In every attempt, whether it was in Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, South Carolina, Tennessee ... blacks were resisted by the local people."

Hoffman said white people would in turn burn down churches, or many times, use violence and beat those working for civil rights. "Mississippi Burning" was just a part of this struggle, Hoffman said.

"A lot of people have complaints about the press, and the press is far from perfection," He said. "But, without it we couldn't even have started to have a free country."

Hoffman graduated from Simpson College in Indianola, Iowa, in 1935 and went on to get his master's degree in journalism at the University of Iowa, Iowa City, Iowa. On his first job, Hoffman made $10 a week. In 1952, CBS was looking for people who knew how to make sound movies.

Grading system to remain

Change to plus, minus system not expected

By Ginger Miller
Collegian Reporter

One of the first things children learn is the alphabet. Alone, these letters are quite arbitrary, with one exception. In school, the letters A through F have special meaning.

Universities in the Big Eight Conference have been making changes in their grading systems, or at least contemplating changes, in recent years.

K-State has been using the straight letter grade system for many years, and there has been little consideration of changing it, said Registrar Donald Foster.

"I would say (there has been) no serious consideration," Foster said.

The plus-minus system incorporates a finer delineation of grades, Foster said.

"It is my feeling that those fine delineations are harder for the faculty to decide between," he said.

The current system is a fair representation of students' work, he said. The plus-minus system tends to shrink the difference between the high and low, Foster said.

"It depends who you want to help," he said.

Students with lower grade point averages tend to improve somewhat, while those with higher GPAs go down, Foster said.

Oklahoma State University uses the straight letter grade system, said Glen Jones, OSU associate registrar. He said the idea of changing to a plus-minus grading system has been proposed.

"It's my feeling that it wouldn't change much," Jones said.

The OSU faculty thinks changing the system would take some of the pressure off when it came time to assign grades, Jones said. However, the faculty would run into the same problems with even more choices.

"It comes down to the fact that you've got to make a decision," he said.

The University of Oklahoma uses the straight letter grade system and has not had any problems with it, said OU Registrar Milford Messer.

"It has been discussed periodically by certain faculty groups," Messer said. "But we've had good results with (the current system) on this campus."

Dana Barton, executive staff assistant at the University of Missouri-Columbia, said the university uses only straight letter grades. This system has been used since 1958, and there have been no thoughts of changing it, Barton said.

The University of Kansas has a rather unique situation using both grading systems, said Gary Thompson, KU director of student records.

Thompson said KU is divided into schools. Some use straight letter grades, while others use the plus-minus system. He said only 10 percent of the courses are graded with a plus or minus.

Recently about half of the professional schools chose to use the plus-minus system. Thompson said a plus or minus is also figured into the student's GPA, with the exception of the A+.

KU's school of liberal arts and sciences, which offers approximately 70 percent of the university's courses, does not use the plus-minus system, Thompson said.

In 1988 the school's governing board passed a system change proposal, he said. After debating the issue, the board adopted the plus-minus system. There were not many students in attendance at that meeting.

When the students realized what had happened, they successfully repealed the proposal, Thompson said.

The schools using the plus-minus system ignore the A+ grade, he said. The university did not want to allow a grade point average above a 4.0 GPA.

Thompson said the faculty at KU in favor of plus-minus grading wanted to have extra options.

Conscientious instructors agonize over turning in grades, he said. They felt it might be easier if they had the option of an A- or a B+, for example.

Iowa State University switched to the plus-minus system in the fall of 1981, said ISU Registrar John Sjoblom. In addition to the grading system change, the university also began using the semester system, rather than the quarter system.

Iowa State had previously used a straight letter grade system, he said. It is difficult to identify any changes in GPAs since the plus-minus system was incorporated because of the additional time change.

Sjoblom said the change came about through a faculty vote, while Iowa State was the only school in the Big Eight still on the quarter system.

The students were opposed at first. He said one can argue the systems either way; it is really just a matter of preference. Iowa State also decided against adding A+ to its grading system.

A lengthy evaluation was conducted two years after the changes, and overall there were no problems, Sjoblom said.

"As with any change, it took everyone a while to get used to it," he said.

The University of Nebraska-Lincoln uses yet another grading system, said UNL Registrar Ted Pfeifer. Since 1970 the university has used a plus-only system. Students can receive straight letter grades or those with a plus. An A+ can be assigned, but no numeric value more than a straight A is given.

The faculty senate just did a canvassing of the university and questionnaires revealed there was "no heartfelt need for change," Pfeifer said.

The university had previously used a number system, with 9 being the highest and 1 failing, he said. By using only a plus, the system converted easily from the number system.

Pfeifer said every system will have some advantages, and this system is "as fair as anything."

"It's always tough to pigeonhole students into a particular grade," Pfeifer said.

In the spring of 1985, the University of Colorado began using the plus-minus grading system. Michele Matthews, staff assistant, said prior to that the university used only straight letter grades.

Matthews said Colorado does not use the A+.

Tax bill amended; Hayden's plan waits

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee amended a bill Thursday that would give taxpayers the option of deducting their federal taxes, changing it so the option would not cost the treasury any more than the $79 million in Gov. Mike Hayden's income tax cut proposal.

The committee did not endorse the bill, however. It will resume work on it next week.

The panel did endorse a measure that would repeal an alternative minimum tax, which requires that all Kansas businesses pay at least some state income tax regardless of tax shelters.

Supporters of the repeal say the tax hurts new, developing businesses, while opponents say profitable firms escape from paying state income taxes because of tax shelters.

The Senate committee is considering two bills that would allow Kansans to deduct the federal taxes they pay from their state taxable income. Such a provision was amended into the income tax reduction bill that was returned to the conference committee by the House on Thursday.

Sen. Dan Thiessen, R-Independence, committee chairman, said the federal deductibility bill before the committee would provide the deduction that certain House members wanted when it amended Hayden's tax plan Feb. 1.

"I tried to explain that to the House members, but apparently they don't understand very well," Thiessen said.

Senate Majority Leader Fred Kerr, R-Pratt, a member of the tax committee, said few people would use the federal deductibility option. The proposal is patterned after one used in Oklahoma.

"There are some administrative complexities that I really don't like," Kerr said.

Last year, the Legislature approved a tax revision package that repealed the deduction for federal taxes and reduced the tax rates and the number of brackets for individual income taxes.

Under the proposal under study now, people taking the deduction would have higher tax rates and four tax brackets.

The proposal amended into the bill was developed by Rep. Keith Roe, R-Mankato, chairman of the House Taxation Committee.

Sen. James L. Francisco, D-Mulvane, said allowing federal deductibility would reduce the tax break for middle-income taxpayers and would benefit only those who earn more than $100,000.

He added that outside the Statehouse, he has never heard anyone complain about federal deductibility being repealed last year.

The committee's decision to endorse a bill that would repeal the alternative minimum tax sends the measure to the Senate for debate.

The law imposing an alternative minimum tax was passed during the 1988 session.

Efforts made to have textbooks mention religion

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Public school textbooks rarely mention religion, and growing efforts are being made to overcome this gap in the education of the young.

They simply can't know about the real world "without understanding the intensity of religious faith throughout history," says Ernest L. Boyer, president of the Carnegie Foundation for Advancement of Teaching.

But they aren't getting that understanding now, conclude an accumulating succession of studies which say schools and their textbooks virtually exclude information about religion.

Boyer, former U.S. commissioner of education, is chairman of a review board of educational experts that is developing a one-week course for elementary and high schools on the principles and problems of religious liberty.

The board was formed in cooperation with the Williamsburg Charter Foundation, a non-partison, nonsectarian project working for a more balanced place for religion in public life.

"For far too long, we've had a remarkable silence on teaching about religion in the nation's public schools," Boyer said. This largely stems from fear such teaching might violate the constitutional principle of separation of church and state, he said.

However, the new projects emphasize adherence to that principle and to Supreme Court decisions outlawing organized prayers or devotions in schools.

The irony is that those decisions, in barring religious indoctrination from schools, specified that the schools could, and should, teach about religion.

Former Supreme Court Justice Tom Clark's majority opinion said "one's education is not complete without a study of comparative religion" and the "Bible is worthy of study for its literary and historic qualities."

However, studies find that the schools mostly ignore the subject.

The findings have come from strong church-state separationists such as Americans United For Separation of Church and State and People for the American Way, as well as from various professional education groups.

There is a "glaring omission" of religion in public school curricula, says the nation's largest educational leadership organization, the Association for Supervision of Curriculum Development.

It urged local schools, education agencies, textbook publishers and educators to develop instructional materials and methods to teach about religion in various areas such as history, literature and political science.

Student smokers need incentive to break habit

By Bryan Ackley
Collegian Reporter

According to Surgeon General C. Everett Koop, nearly half of all living adults who ever smoked have quit, but some students think it's going to take a lot more than the information in his report to convince the other half of smokers to quit.

"I know (smoking) can affect me and I should listen, but I don't feel a strong enough compulsion to stop just because (Koop's) telling me to," said Rod Pocowatchit, senior in graphic design.

Pocowatchit said that sometimes he wants a cigarette because he's stressed and other times because he's in an area where smoking is restricted. However, he admits he smokes mainly because of an addiction to nicotine.

An addictive chemical in tobacco, nicotine is only one of 300 chemical compounds found in cigarette smoke, according to the American Lung Association.

The ALA stated "secondhand" smoke from burning tobacco pollutes the air which smokers and nonsmokers breathe. Other pollutants include chemicals such as arsenous oxide, cyanide, formaldehyde, ammonia, carbon monoxide and tar.

Neil Payne, freshman in business administration, has been smoking since 1982 and said he understands the health hazards associated with smoking. He said people often focus on the environmental problems caused by cigarette smoking, but the problem is nicotine addiction.

"Most people just don't understand the addiction," Payne said. "I started smoking during my last year of American Legion (high school) baseball. I used to bum cigarettes from this guy who drove us to our games. He was only one year older than I was, but I looked up to him because he was really independent."

He avoids activities such as swimming and basketball because smoking is not permitted at the pool or gym.

"(People) don't see many smokers studying in the library, either," Payne said.

Carole Noble, graduate student in landscape architecture, said she quit smoking.

"It doesn't make much sense for me to bike, do aerobics and keep smoking every day," Noble said.

She started smoking five years ago because many of her friends smoked, but now none of her friends smoke.

Bill Arck, director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Services, said 95 percent of the people treated for alcohol or drug abuse in the United States are addicted to nicotine.

Doctors may see smoking as an indicator of an addictive tendency in the individual, but this is not always the case, Arck said.

An addiction to nicotine does not necessarily represent the first stage of a progession toward alcohol or drug abuse.

According to an alcohol and drug education publication, low doses of nicotine stimulate the autonomic nervous system, and high doses depress the system, which affects gland and smooth muscle action.

Stimulation of the autonomic nervous system leads to constriction of the blood vessels and increased blood pressure and heart rate. Depression of the autonomic nervous system affects the central nervous system, which controls respiration.

"I took my last cigarette from my last pack, put it in the closet and called it my emergency cigarette," said Dawn Dale, junior in veterinary medicine.

Dale quit smoking during two pregnancies.

Pocowatchit, Payne, Noble and Dale said they support the surgeon general's efforts to educate children on the effects of tobacco use but said they are not convinced education alone is enough to prevent smoking because none of them started smoking until they were adults.

Class promotes art awareness

Nathan Dodge, 7, Manhattan, concentrates deeply to get just the right look on his drawing in the Elementary Children's Art Institute class sponsered by the Community Education Program.

Since some children only have art class every two weeks in school, this class is offers the children and additional artistic outlet. Children will learn about all types of artistic mediums.

Story by Carrie Law Photos by Joe Freeman

Young artists at work

While most children in grade school spend their Saturday mornings planted in front of the television set, Lois Payton's group of 16 students, ranging in age from eight to 12, are learning to appreciate art.

These children are participants of the Elementary Children's Art Institute, which is offered by the Community Education Program.

Payton, instructor for the art institute and Manhattan resident, said the children will learn about all types of media.

"We will start with pencil drawing and go on to collage and water color," she said. "Eventually I hope the kids can work with acrylic painting."

Payton said she uses the same approach in working with the kids that she learned in art instruction courses.

"I try to bring it down to a level the kids can enjoy," she said. "So, it really is a fine art program and not just a general art program."

Payton and the children believe definite benefits result from the art program.

"(The children) don't get a lot of chances to do art work in school," Payton said. "They have art and it's a very good program ... but they only have art every 10 days or two weeks.

"Usually they rush in and get the project done as quickly as possible. Some of the children rarely get a chance to finish what they want to do," she said. "With this program if they are interested in art, if they want to learn some new things, they can really explore their ability."

Matthew Troup, a fourth-grade student at Eugene Field School, is a second-year student in the art institute program.

"I like coming every week," Troup said. "It's fun doing the art projects."

Troup said his favorite project since enrolling in the class was a papier mache mask he made last fall.

"We had an art show put up in the library with our pictures," he said.

Last fall's students had their artwork displayed at Manhattan Public Library in January.

The art institute is a result of a K-State student's marketing research project, developed by Scott Langton, graduate student in business administration. David Andrus, associate professor of marketing, assigned the project as part of his marketing research class.

"I wanted to combine my class research project with the work I do with (the) Community Education Program," Langton said. "I decided to investigate the feasibility of a fine arts program for elementary-age children by conducting a survey."

Langton's committee surveyed parents at Parent Teacher Association meetings and compiled the results. Langton discovered the fine arts programs in Manhattan are fragmented.

"A lot of people are doing a little bit here and there," Langton said. "But what we would like to achieve eventually is (a combination) of the fine arts programs."

The project exposed a strong desire for additional art instruction among art instructors, children and parents in the Manhattan-Ogden Unified School District 383, he said. The program was developed in cooperation with the Manhattan Arts Council and USD 383 to work with existing fine arts programs in Manhattan.

The program was developed to suit the needs of the participants, said Langton, who also serves as coordinator.

"Eventually we would like to expand the program to include other fine arts such as dance and theater," he said. "However, we just don't have the time to develop the program further."

Langton also hopes to expand the program by this summer or next fall to include kindergarten, first- and second-grade students.

Bill Butler, administrator for the Division of Continuing Education, believes the biggest benefit of the program is the individualized attention children receive in the session.

"It's also a neat opportunity for the kids to get to come on the K-State campus and take a class in the art studio," Butler said.

The first session started Jan. 28 and will run until March 9. The second session will last from March 20 until April 29. The first session offers classes from 4 p.m. to 6 p.m. Tuesdays and from 10 a.m. until noon Saturdays.

More information about the art institute and registration information is available from the Continuing Education registration office.

Karl Kramer 11, Manhattan, gets directions from Lois Payton during the Saturday class. Children from eight to 12 years of age participate in the program.

Civil rights film 'selective' in historical accuracy

By Tom McLaughlin
Collegian Reviewer

Review

Do you have any idea what it's like to live like this? All they see when they look at the South is bigots and racists. Hatred isn't something you're born with, you're taught it ... At school, they said segregation is what the Bible teaches. At 7 years old, if you're told to hate enough, you believe the hatred ... you breathe it ... marry it.

"Mississippi Burning," an Alan Parker film, has catalyzed controversy in the past few weeks concerning the script's use of biased viewpoint, over-sensationalism and selective historical accuracy.

Although attempting to biographically recount the 1964 murders of civil rights activists James Chaney, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner, the film loses credibility in its slanted point of view and lack of historical exposition.

The story begins with the murders of the three activists who had been encouraging blacks to register to vote in the fictional Jessup County.

Soon after their disappearance, the FBI is on the scene in an attempt to discover their whereabouts.

Alan Ward, played by Willem DaFoe, and Rupert Anderson, played by Gene Hackman, are the mismatched "Hoover boys" in search of information and justice.

Ward is a straightforward agent who still has faith in the system. Anderson, on the other hand, is a less-idealistic, former Mississippi sheriff who knows how the system really works.

Ward ceases to take advice from the more Southern-wise Anderson and continually pulls rank on him. Soon, hundreds of agents and naval reserves are working on the case which, of course, grabs the attention of the national press.

The local chapter of the Ku Klux Klan fails to appreciate national attention and begins to inflict more severe punishment on the blacks of Jessup County.

In the midst of all this action, Anderson manages to find the time to rescue and fall in love with an abused Southern woman, who happens to be married to the town's deputy sheriff.

The sheriff's office, mayor and townspeople join in the conflict to create the historically accurate "us versus them" mentality. The filmmakers, however, missed historical accuracy more than they portrayed it.

The most heinous part is the very "white" point of view which permeates the film, almost ignoring black perspective altogether.

Its depiction of blacks and black perspective not only lacks depth, but is incredibly pessimistic. Although the violent socialization process might have bound the Jessup County blacks to silence in public situations, that is no excuse for a shallow development of the black characters and an inability to examine how the black culture privately dealt with that slice of time.

The film was also selective in its inclusion of the historical facts of the period. While not dubbed a documentary, the film still overlooks the $30,000 bribe the Feds used to obtain information concerning the deaths; instead it focuses on the compassion, concern and quick wit of the FBI.

Other relevant events the film failed to disclose or include are Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s Freedom Summer March that involved thousands of activists of the Student Nonviolence Coordinating Committee, the federal grand jury involved in the case, or the Supreme Court's overturning of District Judge Harold Cox's decision to dismiss charges against whites because he supported segregation.

The film shows a lot of violence against blacks and is accurate in depicting the actual "Mississippi burnings" in the summer of 1964. There were, in fact, more than 60 homes and churches destroyed by arson-related fires.

Despite its shortcomings, the film still depicts gut-wrenching acts of cruelty, many of which pulled shrieks and outbursts from the audience. Gene Hackman will most likely receive an Oscar nomination for his Southern-wise Rupert Anderson.

If anything, "Mississippi Burning" gives a balanced portrayal of the hatred, fear and attitudes of the Jessup County residents, while providing the '80s generation with a gruesome look at the unbelievably violent, but true, section of American history — "the summer of 1964 when America was at war with itself."

Education seminars to address problems

By The Collegian Staff

The KSU Education Council will sponsor its second annual Education Symposium and workshops for education majors at 8 a.m. today in the Union.

"Only students who registered for the symposium last week can attend," said Donna Wohletz, student assistant to the dean of College of Education. "There are 460 students currently registered."

According to the agenda, a continental breakfast and registration check-in will run from 7:30 a.m. to 8 a.m. on the second floor of the Union. David Byrne, dean of the College of Education will give the opening address at 8 a.m.

Starting at 8:30 a.m., students will attend hour-long workshops until 11:30 a.m.

"For each hour there are four different workshops to choose from," said Linda Brown, secretary to the dean of the College of Education. All workshops will take place in the Union.

The topics of the workshops range from "Presenting Yourself" to "Classroom Communications" to "Technological Advancement," Brown said. The college will provide an agenda listing the 20 different workshops.

The 33 speakers for the workshops are education faculty members who specialize in these areas.

Lunchbag Theater offers noon hour alternative

By Craig Hamrick
Collegian Reporter

If you're looking for a unique way to spend your lunch hour, Lunchbag Theater may be it.

Each week, student-produced, one-act plays featuring K-State actors are presented at 11:30 a.m. in the Purple Masque Theatre in East Stadium. Admission is free and since the plays run through the noon hour, audiences are welcome to bring sack lunches.

This semester's first Lunchbag Theater was presented Thursday to a near-capacity crowd of about 75 people. "Triplets," which featured three actresses, was directed by Stephanie Sikes, graduate student in theater.

Sikes said she was pleased with the audience turnout, as well as the performance.

She has performed in several K-State productions as an actress and a singer. Sikes said she is studying direction to have a broader background when she looks for work in the future.

"This is a tough profession," Sikes said. "If I'm going to succeed, I feel like this is the intelligent approach to take. If you have the disappointment of not getting a part you're up for, you still need to be able to work."

Lunchbag Theater, which is in its 13th year, is part of a class taught by Lewis Shelton, associate professor of speech and director of theater. He said the one-act plays are a good training ground for both actors and directors.

"It's a good way for them to get their feet wet," Shelton said. "Tackling a full-length project is a challenge and they need to go through the shorter plays to learn what their capabilities are."

Shelton has been an instructor at K-State for 16 years. He started Lunchbag Theater because he found that students in some of his classes were having trouble getting motivated to perform without an audience. He works closely with the project directors. However, he leaves most of the decisions, including picking the plays, to them.

"The idea was to inspire students," Shelton said. "At some schools, students say they want to direct something or act in something, and they're just turned out to do it. The Lunchbag program gives them some guidance."

He said the workshop atmosphere is helpful because both the actors and directors are students.

"They are learning to communicate the way artists must communicate with each other," Shelton said. "Here they are doing it with more equality than in most of the work they have done so far."

Camille Diamond, freshman in theater, was one of the actresses in "Triplets." She said the diversity of tasks students have to undertake in the program is a good teacher.

Upcoming Lunchbag Theater productions include "Hello Out There," on Thursday; "The Vice," on Feb. 23; "Open Admissions," on March 2; "Wormwood," on March 7; "A Good Time," on March 9; and "How It Hangs," on March 23.

Zoo ensures safety, warmth

Animals protected from cold

By Laurie Cox
Collegian Reporter

As winter approaches, household heaters are turned up, storm windows are put in place and pets are brought inside.

For those animals who live at Sunset Zoo, cold weather precautions are also taken to ensure their safety and warmth.

"A large majority of the animals have little or no problem adjusting to the weather," said Don Wixom, curator of education at Sunset Zoo.

Wixom said that in the winter months, tropical birds, reptiles, invertebrates and smaller animals are brought inside to a holding area where they are cared for in a heated environment.

"The tigers are an ideal example of an animal's adjustment capabilities. They remain in their cages, which have small buildings that are heated at a temperature less than that of the average household, about 55 to 60 degrees," Wixom said. "With the heavier coats on the animals, it is necessary to keep temperatures low so as to not overheat the animal."

These buildings are used throughout the year, he said. The keepers manage the animals by conditioning them to use the buildings, coaxing them in when it is time for feeding and cleaning of the exhibits.

The Japanese snow monkeys also need little help adapting to the cold. Their natural habitats include harsh winter and hot summers. The keepers need only provide them with a den for shelter.

All the animals' diets are increased and adjusted during the cold season to assist them in creating a healthier and warmer layer of body fat and winter fur or feathers, Wixom said.

Many of the smaller animals, such as the bobcat and the serval, a wild African cat, have heated floors in their cages. Others are given straw or heating pads. The smaller birds of prey, such as the Mississippi kite and the short-haired owl, require heat lamps to keep them warm.

A few of the exhibits are covered with tarps to cut down on wind.

Throughout the winter, the keepers periodically check the animals for frostbite and other related health problems.

"With the big temperature fluctuations in Kansas, the animals risk the chance of contracting pneumonia, so it is essential that their health is watched closely," said Caroline Meek, zoo curator.

Wixom said: "One of the main problems we have in the winter is with water freezing over. It is pertinent that the animals have an available supply of water."

He said Kansas ice storms storms are more of a problem than snow or wind storms because they can cause electrical shortages that affect the heating of the cages.

"We're on such steep slopes that it makes it difficult for some of the animals — like Charlie, the resident camel — to get footing to reach their food and water," Wixom said.

One of the main jobs of the keepers is to check the furnaces, filters and back-up generators. It is also important to check the water pipes for freezing.

The zoo has special emergency plans in case of disasters.

"There really isn't much we can do in the case of a tornado except put the animals in their shelters," Wixom said.

In past years, the zoo has dealt with wind damage and flooding.

"The zoo has a plan for every disaster, including a nuclear emergency," Wixom said.

The Riley County Police Department patrols the grounds to ensure against trespassers and other emergencies.

Steven Matthews, zoo director, resides on the grounds to be near if something does occur.

"For the most part, the winter is hardest on the workers," Wixom said. "They are the people who put in the hours. They sometimes come in after hours at night to check the animals and to secure the grounds."

Cold winter weather affects some animals at the Sunset Zoo, such as this emu, very little. Although its native land is Australia, it adapted easily to Kansas temperatures. Other animals need more attention.

Baker opens talks on missile plan

By The Associated Press

BONN, West Germany — Secretary of State James A. Baker III on Sunday opened critical talks with West German leaders who have balked at a NATO plan to upgrade short-range nuclear missiles in Europe.

Baker flew in from London after sessions with British leaders and immediately met with Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, a strong advocate of reducing nuclear tensions in Europe.

Baker, on an eight-day trip to visit the 15 U.S. NATO allies, told reporters during the flight he was not worried about West German Chancellor Helmut Kohl's statement last week that the Lance missiles now deployed are adequate until 1995.

Under the proposal before the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, the current 70-mile range would be extended with new rockets that could hit targets about 320 miles away.

"I think what we need to do is to find out exactly what the German government's position is going to be," Baker said.

Genscher, greeting Baker at rain-swept Bonn-Cologne airport, pledged to "work cooperatively together."

On Baker's agenda in Bonn also were two other touchy issues — Western curbs on technology sales to the Soviet Union and the help West German firms gave to Libya in the construction of an alleged chemical weapons plant.

A senior U.S. official, briefing reporters after Baker's 2½ -hour dinner meeting with Genscher, declined to provide any details other than the talk was "extremely warm and cordial" and the two stressed the need for consultation among the allies.

Baker planned to stay overnight at Schloss Gymnich, the government's country estate, fly to Denmark and Norway for brief talks with officials there on Monday, and then return to Bonn to see Kohl and Genscher tonight.

Commenting on his meetings earlier Sunday with Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher of Britain and Sir Geoffrey Howe, the foreign secretary, Baker said he received support on many NATO issues but declined to elaborate.

A British source, who demanded anonymity, said Baker and Howe agreed a NATO summit probably should be held in late May.

Baker's visit to West Germany comes after its leaders hinted in recent weeks they were unhappy with the NATO proposal to begin replacing the short-range missiles in Europe.

Board seeks to ban alcohol ads in parks

By Joe Kennedy
Collegian Reporter

Manhattan Parks and Recreation Advisory Board will present a proposal to the City Commission asking it to enforce an ordinance prohibiting signs advertising tobacco, alcohol and other controlled substances in the city's parks.

The City Commission is scheduled to hear the recommedation at its March 7 meeting.

The signage problem was brought to the attention of the Little Apple Task Force after the Frank Anneberg Twin Oaks Softball Complex, located in west Manhattan, used covers for its dugouts paid for by Campbell Distributors, said Erma Riley, task force chairwoman.

Dennis Cook, sales manager for Campbell Distributors, said one dugout cover has the name Budweiser on it and the other has Bud Light.

In investigating the perceived problem, the task force discovered an existing ordinance prohibiting such signage. The task force's objectives are to keep the ordinance as it is stated with no amendments and to ensure the existing signage in the parks be brought into compliance with the ordinance, Riley said.

Dorothy Bollman, Little Apple Task Force member, said the task force surveyed six of the eight cities of the Big Eight Conference, Junction City and Emporia regarding similar ordinances.

"We found that all of them except Emporia have the same ordinances about signage as Manhattan," she said.

Emporia had a project by the American Legion that sold advertisements in one of its parks, but it allowed no alcohol advertising, Bollman said.

Using the survey's information and that of articles addressing the connection of alcohol and sports and its detriment to society, the task force attempted to influence the recommendation of the advisory board.

Ron Fehr, assistant director of Manhattan Parks and Recreation, said the advisory board voted to recommend to the City Commission that advertising still be allowed with-

Chief justice grants request to delay North's trial

From Staff and Wire Reports

The chief justice on Sunday ordered a delay in the start of Oliver North's Iran-Contra trial, but the independent prosecutor and Justice Department later agreed on a plan aimed at letting the trial go ahead.

Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist granted a Justice Department request to delay North's trial from Monday's scheduled start until Friday, when the full Supreme Court is scheduled to consider the department's objections to the planned release of classified material by North's defense.

Hours later, Attorney General Dick Thornburgh and independent counsel Lawrence Walsh agreed to a proposal that would impose more stringent safeguards on North's use of classified material.

If the proposal is approved by the judge handling the case, U.S. District Judge Gerhard A. Gesell, the Justice Department will ask the Supreme Court to lift the stay so the North trial may proceed, according to statements issued by the department and Walsh.

Walsh and the department filed a sealed motion with Gesell "which requests that the district court enter an additional protective order preventing the release of classified information vital to U.S. national security interests," the Justice Department said in a statement.

Historically, there is "no rule of thumb" used by the courts to determine whether evidence used in a trial could be damaging to national security, said Alden Williams, professor in political science.

"It's all in the judgment of the appropriate jurors," he said.

"Generally, the courts stay away from defining national security," Williams said, adding that the courts displayed this attitude during the Vietnam war.

The courts would not rule on the constitutionality of the war itself, Williams said. Rather, the cases were ones where only basic constitutional rights were supposedly violated — such as more black than white soldiers were dying, he said.

Rehnquist on Sunday ordered "that the trial proceedings in United States vs. Oliver L. North ... be stayed" pending consideration by the full Supreme Court on Friday.

Delaying a trial because justices want to review evidence that may be used in court is "not all that exceptional," Williams said.

"It happens everyday by the local courts. It isn't a ruling ... it's just a delay," he said.

A jury in the case was selected Thursday and returns to court Monday morning.

Walsh, whose office is prosecuting North, had opposed the Justice Department's efforts to delay the trial and wanted to proceed immediately with opening arguments, saying that national security concerns had been amply addressed.

The Justice Department, reflecting concerns of U.S. intelligence agencies, believes Gesell has imposed inadequate controls on North and that the fired National Security Council aide would be permitted to pour out secrets in the courtroom that are damaging to national security.

"The Department of Justice concluded, and the Independent Counsel concurred, that the trial could not go forward without an additional protective order, and that it is essential for the court to enter such an order," said a Justice Department statement.

It said that without such an order, the Justice Department concluded and the Independent Counsel concurred, "that it will be impossible during the defense's opening statement and presentation of evidence to

Youths rob train passengers

LONDON — About 15 knife-wielding youths robbed passengers on an inter-city train early Sunday and attacked some who resisted, resulting in some injuries, Transport Police said.

"At least 11 people were robbed of cash, jewelery and other valuables and two people were taken to a hospital with head and neck injuries," said a police official, speaking anonymously in keeping with British custom.

"We believe there are other passengers who were robbed and have not yet come forward."

Police said the youths are thought to have boarded the 1:37 a.m. train to London's King's Cross station at St. Albans, 19 miles northwest of London. The train was traveling from Bedford, 46 miles north of London.

Police could not estimate the value of goods stolen.

Documentary offends Swedes

STOCKHOLM, Sweden — Hundreds of angry television viewers called the Norwegian Embassy, major newspapers and conservationists to react to a film about Norwegian seal hunting, Swedish media reported Sunday.

The documentary ran on Swedish television Saturday night and showed seal puppies being clubbed to death and seals apparently being skinned alive.

"I have never seen anything as disgusting. I am boycotting Norway," 23-year-old Freddie Karlsson told the Aftonbladet daily.

Some viewers called police to threaten attacks on Norwegian installations, said Swedish radio.

The film, "About Seals and Humans," reportedly triggered similar outrage when it ran on Danish and British television last week.

Yacht to break speed record

SAN FRANCISCO — The yacht Thursday's Child was on the final leg of its historic voyage Sunday to break the New York-to-San Francisco speed record set by the clipper ship Flying Cloud 135 years ago.

At 7 a.m. Sunday, Thursday's Child was nine miles outside the Golden Gate Bridge, sailing in extremely light wind.

The three crew members waved to the crowd after bettering the 89-day trip by the 229-foot clipper ship Flying Cloud during the Gold Rush.

The Coast Guard sent a 95-foot cutter and four utility boats to escort the yacht into the Golden Gate and lessen the danger of a spectator boat accidentically ramming Thursday's Child.

In a ship-to-shore interview Sunday, Thursday's Child crew member Courtney Hazleton told The Associated Press he had "that coming-home feeling."

"It's kind of like a mixed bag of emotions right now," said Hazleton. "Both relief, letdown, that the whole thing's over, and just a general feeling of accomplishment."

Thursday's Child set sail Nov. 23, rounding the dreaded Cape Horn off the tip of South America. Since 1982, five racing boats have been sunk rounding Cape Horn in attempts to beat Flying Cloud's record, set during the Gold Rush.

Swaggart desperate for money

BATON ROUGE, La. — Evangelist Jimmy Swaggart, who admits he sinned but accuses "pornographers" of trying to ruin him, says his once-thriving TV ministry will end this month unless he receives an influx of donations.

"If for whatever reason this week, you close the door in my face or you pass me by ... Feb. 26 will be the final telecast for this ministry," Swaggart said in his television program distributed for broadcast this weekend.

"You are making a choice today, a choice between the pornographers that are working more diligently than you will ever know ... or it's us. It's either the devil or darkness or it's God and light," Swaggart said.

Swaggart did not give any figures of how much money he needed. A guard who answered the phone Sunday said he could not contact Swaggart.

Former Klansman seeks office

NEW ORLEANS — Former Klan leader David Duke has sidestepped several attempts to derail his candidacy for the Louisiana Legislature, and is mounting a door-to-door push for the final week of the campaign.

Opponents were thwarted last week in two actions designed to discredit Duke's candidacy. A lawsuit challenging his residency was not filed, although it still might be later, and militant Jewish protesters were unable to obtain a last-minute parade permit.

Duke, 38, and John Treen, 62, are contenders Saturday for a state House seat from a nearly all-white district in Jefferson Parish, a New Orleans suburb. Both men are Republicans.

Fire guts Holton city hall

HOLTON — A fire that started in an adjoining building gutted city hall late Saturday, police said.

No one was injured. The fire started about 11 p.m. and was still smoldering more than six hours later, Holton police said. Holton firefighters were helped by the Hiawatha, Hoyt and Fairview fire departments.

Holton Fire Chief Ray Paxton said the fire apparently started in an adjoining beauty shop, but he said no cause or damage estimate had been determined.

City manager Gene Williams said most city records and computer files were salvaged from the cement-block building.

Farmers recruited as nurses

LINCOLN, Neb. — Financially strapped farmers and ranchers leaving agriculture might consider a field that has similarities — nursing.

"Farmers can be very nurturing of livestock. They have to know a lot about chemicals used in pesticides and herbicides and drugs used for livestock," said the dean of the University of Nebraska Medical Center Collge of Nursing.

"The nurturing, chemistry and pharmacology of nursing is different, but it draws on some of the same knowledge and ability," said Rosalee Yeaworth.

One man has already made the switch, Yeaworth said.

Drop box to assist traffic flow

By Deborah Dinges
Collegian Reporter

Traffic and parking problems in front of Fairchild Hall may soon be a thing of the past.

A drop box will be placed on a light pole in front of Fairchild for financial aid documents that need to be delivered to the office, said Larry Viterna, director of the Office of Student Financial Assistance.

The idea came was introduced in a meeting of the Council on Traffic, Parking and Police, Viterna said.

"We have had complaints concerning parking and congestion in that area, especially in the beginning of the semester," said Michael Toedman, student representative of the council and junior in business management.

A major reason for the congestion is the lack of student parking in the area and the large number of students who frequent the financial aid office in Fairchild hall, he said.

Students who need to leave documents at the office and who can't find a parking space sometimes illegally park, Toedman said. Frequently, students have to wait in line at the office and by the time they get back to their car they are ticketed.

"The drop box will be more convenient for the students," he said. "It's an extra service to the students."

Viterna said the mail box will eliminate some traffic congestion in the area and long lines in the financial aid office. Now students can deliver documents anytime when it's convenient for them.

Employees at the financial aid office will empty the box once a day, he said.

The cost of the drop box is estimated to be $185, Toedman said. It will be split equally between the council and the student financial aid office.

The plans were approved Thursday by Larry Garvin, director of facilities planning.

A date of completion has not been determined, but Toedman said he hopes the drop box will be done within a month.

Center seeks funds to replace furniture

By Karen Allen
Staff Writer

Because the KSU Child Development Center cannot afford to replace furniture covered with paint containing high levels of lead, University officials are beginning to look into alternative funding sources.

One of those sources may include Kansas Correctional Industries, the manufacturers of the paint, said Barry Michie, chairman of the center's board of directors and an instructor in the department of continuing education.

"We are exploring avenues that range everywhere from contacting KCI ... to asking lumber yards for donations," Michie said.

George Miller, vice-president for administration and finance, said the University is looking into alleviating the financial dilemma of the center.

"I'll do whatever I can to remedy (the situation)," Miller said.

Replacing the existing furniture will cost about $25,000. It must be replaced because the paint contains lead above the .06 maximum level set in 1976 by the Consumer Product Safety Commission for use in situations such as child care centers. Lead ingestion on a regular basis can lead to brain damage and retardation.

The ruling only affects companies which conduct interstate commerce. KCI, which only conducts business within the State of Kansas, was exempt from the ruling.

Dorothy Thompson, associate University attorney, said contacting KCI was "simply a suggestion to see if they would be willing to rectify the problem."

Thompson said she did not know whether KCI could be held liable for any of the furniture replacement costs.

Nancy Bolsen, director of the center, said only yellow-painted furniture remains in the infant and toddler rooms at the center. The yellow paint met the legal limit of .06. Furniture painted red and blue, which surpassed the federally-mandated lead limit, has been moved from the youngest children's rooms and exchanged with yellow components from the older children's areas, she said.

The rest of the lead-painted furniture will be phased out as funds and materials become available, Bolsen said.

The Department of Housing has donated about a dozen shelving units to the center, said Gene Wiley, physical plant supervisor.

Chocolate evokes sensual pleasure

By The Associated Press

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — The romantic effect of giving someone a heart-shaped box of chocolates on Valentine's Day could be more than sentimental.

"Chocolate does have amorous value," said George Higgins, a pastry chef instructor at the 8,000-student Johnson & Wales University in Providence, one of the biggest cooking schools in the world.

"A chemical in the chocolate hits a pleasure center in the brain," Higgins said. "As a gift from a lover to a lover, it would certainly help do the trick."

Chocolate contains phenylethylamine, or PEA, a natural mood-altering chemical also found in the human brain.

"Win a lottery, get a promotion, fall in love, especially fall in love, and your PEA level shoots up. You're optimistic, sociable, and peppy," according to "Chocolate, An Illustrated History" by Marcia and Fredrick Morton. "But if things go wrong, especially if something goes wrong in your love life, you turn listless and depressed because your PEA level is down."

Cocoa butter melts at about body temperature, "so when you put good chocolate in your mouth it begins to melt, it becomes a sensual thing," said Gayle Steinhart, of Gayle's Chocolates in Newport, in a telephone interview from her store in Royal Oak, Mich. She said her sales are 20 times normal on Valentine's Day and the day before.

"The taste of chocolate is a sensual pleasure in itself, existing in the same world as sex," sex therapist Ruth Westheimer wrote in her column, "Ask Dr. Ruth."

But there's also an argument against the romantic effects of chocolate.

"I really wonder whether giving chocolate for Valentine's Day is really the best type of gift if one wants to pursue any type of intense, romantic affair," said Judith Wurtman, a research scientist at Massachusetts Institute of Technology's department of nutrition and food sciences. "The high fat and the high sugar content may make you very sleepy."

"If you're dealing in a situation where the woman is being pursued by the man, it might slow her down theoretically enough that she can be caught," she added.

Whatever the real effect of chocolate, the origins of chocolate-giving on Valentine's Day are obscure.

Centuries ago in Central America, chocolate was associated with divinities and so came to represent health and well-being, according to "Chocolate."

By the 18th century, chocolate's reputation as an aphrodisiac had spread over Europe and North America, according to "The Language of Sex from A to Z" by Robert M. Goldenson and Kenneth N. Anderson.

Guerrillas may take over after Soviet withdrawl

By The Associated Press

KABUL, Afghanistan — Soviet soldiers Sunday handed over their last and most dangerous outpost as they prepared to return home and leave the Afghan army to defend the capital against Moslem guerrillas.

The Soviet-backed Afghan government renewed its offer to negotiate with the guerrillas.

A Soviet Foreign Ministry spokesman said the remaining 300 Soviet soldiers in Kabul would leave Tuesday, weather permitting.

The departure would be a day ahead of the deadline set by a U.N.-sponsored accord to end nine years of Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

The last soldiers were guarding the Kabul airport while the Soviets completed a food airlift to the capital, which the guerrillas are expected to besiege when the Red Army is gone.

A U.N. airlift of food, medicine and blankets was suspended Sunday after Ethiopia pulled out of the program, officials said.

An Ethiopian airliner made one flight to Kabul, unloaded 32 tons of wheat and then refused to return to the city, said Sadruddin Aga Khan, coordinator of the U.N. Office of Economic and Humanitarian Assistance to Afghanistan.

"I'm not able to say if or when the next flight will be," Aga Khan said at a news conference.

Explosion prompts safety investigation

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A natural gas explosion Friday that killed an elderly couple and destroyed their Oak Grove home has increased pressure to improve the safety of bare-steel service lines, officials say.

Since Friday, the Missouri Public Service Commission has launched a wide-ranging investigation into its own enforcement of safety rules, the role of KPL Gas Service in preventing explosions and the reasons that steel service lines remain unprotected, officials said Saturday. KPL provided gas to the Oak Grove home, as it does to much of the Kansas City area.

In addition, U.S. Sen. Jack Danforth, Missouri Republican, has asked the U.S. Transportation Department to investigate the blast.

And several regulators in both Kansas and Missouri said they are now convinced that utilities cannot prevent bare-steel lines from failing, even if they are checked for corrosion and leaks.

Instead, the state regulators said they may order utilities to tear up and replace thousands of miles of steel lines, which KPL spokesman Hal Hudson said would require "a massive investment." KPL alone has 2,400 miles ot steel lines in the two states.

"The cost is going to be put on the customers," agreed Ron Ellis, chief of pipeline safety for Missouri. "They will pay more, but I'd have to say right now, the public is willing to pay more."

Gas explosions have killed five persons and injured 18 others in Missouri since late October. In Kansas, an explosion injured four persons in September in Overland Park.

State and federal investigators have linked many of those explosions to corrosion in bare steel service lines installed before 1971. That's when federal safety rules first made utilities responsible for protecting lines against corrosion and for checking gas leaks in the customer-owned pipes.

"Clearly, we see bare steel service lines as a significant safety hazard to the public," said PSC Chairman William D. Steinmeier. "We may need a systematic plan to change out these lines. That would be a step beyond just checking for leaks, as KPL is doing now."

"That very well may be the best way to resolve this problem," agreed Scott Stockwell, director of utilities for the Kansas Corporation Commission. "Any program we come up with is going to have to be very strong."

The Kansas agency last fall ordered KPL to begin checking for corrosion in all bare steel service lines. Missouri regulators have never ordered KPL to do the corrosion tests.

However, after the September explosion in Overland Park, KPL began checking lines in both states. By Dec. 31, the utility found more than 8,600 leaks. About 1,300 of those were rated as hazardous, or requiring immediate repair.

The Kansas checks were finished in January, but an estimated 60,000 service lines in Missouri — mainly in the Kansas City, St. Joseph and Joplin areas — remain untested. Hudson says the utility has brought in more inspectors since Friday's blast and will have all tests done by early March.

The Oak Grove home of Forrest Johnson, 77, and his wife, Ethelyne Johnson, 75, had been scheduled for testing within the next 30 days, Hudson said.

Bush's address reveals bigger deficit, military

Read his lips.

That's what George Bush wants us to do. After his address to a joint session of Congress on Thursday, it's easy to see why.

If all we do is read President Bush's lips, things look rosy — tax credits for low income families, child care, and families who adopt children; $500 million in grants to the nation's best schools; enterprise zones for urban areas; pledges to environmentalists; a society "free from discrimination and bigotry;" and, of course, no new taxes.

If we choose to read the bottom line and the fine print, though, things begin to look different.

For one, there's a $98 billion deficit, a substantial increase from the final budget submitted by the old deficit master himself, Ronald Reagan.

While the military budget and a host of non-military programs are frozen, only the military programs are adjusted to meet inflation. In other words, most domestic programs will be cut, albeit for the few politically popular morsels Bush handed out Thursday night.

On top of that, there's a nearly 50 percent cut in capital gains taxes, which is sure to benefit the nation's wealthiest taxpayers and place the burden of that loss in revenue squarely on the lower tax brackets. Bush argues this will encourage long-term investment.

In other words, Bush is giving defense and business interests top priority — just like his less kinder, less gentler predecessor.

In hopes of pleasing the rest of the nation, Bush has come up with a few essentially cosmetic domestic programs, many of which probably wouldn't have been written into the budget had he not promised them during the campaign.

The end result is an even bigger deficit. In the long run, such a policy is bound to hurt government, business and the economy. And no amount of lip-flapping will remedy that.

Other Perspectives

If Hayden thought he could push through his idea of returning the windfall returns to the wealthier among all Kansans, he was wrong.

Hayden's windfall returns idea was one of the most blatantly unfair political schemes in Kansas politics.

... As far as the death penalty is concerned, the Senate vote was more than appropriate.

It's about time the governor starts focusing on how to keep the residents of his state alive and healthy, rather than spending all his energy on proposals of how to eliminate some of them.

Students desire mud run

Commentary

Chad L. Sanborn
Collegian Columnist

Don't give me this crap about an athletic fee! And I could give a rat's hairy hiney about the ankle biters' co-op. Furthermore, it's no secret students believe Farrell Library and Lafene Student Health Center would better serve the students in the capacity of overgrown crack houses than in their present functions.

But there is no doubt in anyone's mind that we need a mud run.

Hey, I'm just the first person to come forward and say what's on the collective mind of the student body. Nobody has really said anything yet, but I can see the idea on the horizon, just waiting for one brave soul with enough guts and foresight to bring the whole ball o' wax out into the open.

Nay, I'm sure there are doubters among you. But I have my finger on the main artery of the campus of this fine Midwestern land-grant institution. I say the time has come for some real entertainment.

Sure, it sounds kinda silly. A mud run. You know, mean, screaming, wheelie machines, chugging and churning through gobs of gooky, grimey, wet dirt, a.k.a. mud. But as one avid fan of hydrodized soil put it, "It would make a nice cultural mirror to the McCain Series."

Oh, get off your high horse, you crickly ole grandmas; live a little. You know deep down, where it counts, you love this idea as though you came up with it yourself.

So, I says to myself, "Self, you will lead this one. Too many times you have lain back in the hammock of apathy with the blond nymphette of indecision on your right and the nubile, red-headed stepchild of isolation on your left. You are the champion of the people."

In an effort to get this fine-cut gem of an idea set in the brass ring of accomplishment, I got on the horn to the power brokers out at the Bramlage Bar and Grill.

First, I conned the secretary into letting me talk to Jim Muller, the No. 2 honcho. He seemed like a generally nice fellow but was hesitant to talk about why there have not been, nor will there be, any mud runs at Bramlage.

Before referring me to Charlie Thomas, the big cheese out there, Muller spouted off something about the arena being incapable of handling such dirt-oriented events.

"Don't give me any of that bureaucratic malarkey," I screamed into the telephone. "Why in the name of Aunt Bea did you build the thing if you knew it was going to lack the capacity to handle such a wholesome event as a truck and tractor pull? What gives here, man?"

"You must have known that sooner or later the students — whom all you University geeks work for, if I may remind you — would demand no less than they deserve."

Needless to say, Muller knew he was up against all that is good and right about America. He had an inkling that things like limited space, non-retractable seats and inadequate ventilation for such events just weren't enough to jerk this moral demand to a halt.

After spinning my wheels with Muller and then his boss, Thomas, known as the shogun of family entertainment, I started to falter.

"Self," I says to myself, "maybe it won't get any better than Ice Capades."

But I couldn't give in. I was fighting for the rights of the forgotten masses, the tuition-paying students.

Then it hit me like a drunk in a four-wheel drive: Hell, I bet students would pay an extra five clams at tuition time for the sake of bringing the RedMan-TNT Pulling Series to where it rightfully belongs.

Pat Coyle, sophomore in business administration and a former football walk-on, said students might fork up the dough, but because everybody is asking for money — athletics, the co-op, Lafene, Farrell — students would be wary.

"I guess it depends on where your priorities are," he said, obviously as pleased with his quote as I was.

There is another factor in this equation of terra firma sport. Ejaz Ahmad, graduate student in architecture, has lived in the grand old U.S.A. for 14 years and has yet to witness the joy of a 4x4 monster machine spraying mud on a crowd of drunken yahoos. Back home, he used to attend cricket games, so it goes without saying that he would love a mud run.

Although Ahmad admitted Americans have an odd sense of enjoyment, citing namely MTV's bone-headed gameshow, "Remote Control," and although he admitted he might go see a mud run if someone gave him a free ticket and a ride to the event in a limo with a wet bar, he stopped short of backing the fee.

Like all great ideas, there are those who can't see the light until you shine it in their eyes.

Hidden back in the clouded smoking section of the Union cafeteria, where all of God's children are equal, I met Angela Waltz, freshman in architecture, and Wade Radina, sophomore in political science.

"We have a right to a mud run," Waltz demanded. A few moments before she hadn't wanted to be quoted, but once I explained the implications of a mud run, she was into it.

"It makes so much more sense than a $15 athletic fee," Waltz said. "There should be a box to check (on your fee card) if you want to give the money (for the mud run)."

Radina wasn't buying the gibberish about the coliseum being incapable of hosting a mud run either.

"Mud is a natural thing. All you need is some big sheets of plastic, some dirt and some water," he said. Unfortunately, he stopped short of saying, "C'mon, gang. Let's put on a mud run."

So stand up and be counted ye who demand only what is yours. Let's make some posters, get a table in the Union and form a task force to look into this deal. If all goes well, we could waste a good part of next year watching the big boys with the big toys make mud pies.

Letters

Fee information

Editor,

This is in response to Greg Jennings' letter, in the Feb. 7 Collegian, concerning an athletic fee proposal that may go before the student body in the form of a referendum.

I've been awake and have been seriously following the issue for the past year. As a student senator for the past two years, I've had the opportunity to observe and research the issue and have made a decision to support the athletic fee proposal. I feel the facts about the fee should be presented to clear up any misconceptions that Greg Jennings' letter may have created.

My first point concerns the free admission into all non-revenue sports. If used, this could be a value of $47 (if you consider the cost of each ticket to be $1, although in some cases the price may be $2).

With a promising future for the volleyball, baseball and women's basketball teams, the enjoyment potential for K-State fans is limitless.

Jennings' letter also implies the KSU Athletic Department wouldn't be asking for this fee if people attended these non-revenue sporting events. Non-revenue sports means just that; the incoming revenue is little or insignificant. The only incoming ticket sales revenue basically comes from men's basketball and football.

Secondly, the cap on season ticket prices would benefit the 6,000 student basketball ticket holders. Under the plan with an athletic fee, the football team plans on bringing a respectable showing for the Big Eight Conference and K-State. Who else then would benefit from this cap? All the born-again football fans who will invade the stadium to see the "new" team.

Third, by not combining the basketball and football tickets, the athletic department is giving the student body a choice when deciding their own form of sports entertainment.

Presently, K-State has the lowest athletic budget in the Big Eight at $5.5 million, with the highest budget being at the University of Oklahoma at $12.5 million.

The question is, who should pay to help bring the budget up to par? Let's look at who will benefit from having quality athletics.

I feel the students who graduate with a degree from K-State would benefit the most. We all know about the quality of education we are getting here, but whether you like it or not, the cold facts remain that the rest of the country knows of K-State through athletics.

Since quality sports teams bring nationwide attention to the University, the K-State diploma becomes even more valuable.

Another area in which K-State athletics will lose an estimated $500,000 in the upcoming year will be with the probationary status of other Big Eight teams.

With the crackdown on recruiting violations, especially within the Big Eight, one must realize the severe financial blow we will take with the University of Kansas, OU and Oklahoma State University all on probation in one form or another. Now the University of Missouri is being investigated and there are rumors of the University of Nebraska-Lincoln being investigated, too. All these teams contribute to the Big Eight and K-State revenues because of bowl and tournament appearances.

Two years ago, I voted against the proposed athletic fee at that time mainly because I was uninformed, much the way I believe Greg Jennings is.

As chairman of the committee looking into the athletic fee, I believe I have been given the opportunity to evaluate and make a well educated decision concerning this matter. I strongly support this fee because I now understand the benefits we will all inherit by attending K-State.

Whether you go out and support or oppose any potential fee referendum, the main thing is to be informed. I encourage everyone given the opportunity to attend a presentation on this fee to do so. The worst possible voter is an uninformed voter.

Souza records Reagan years

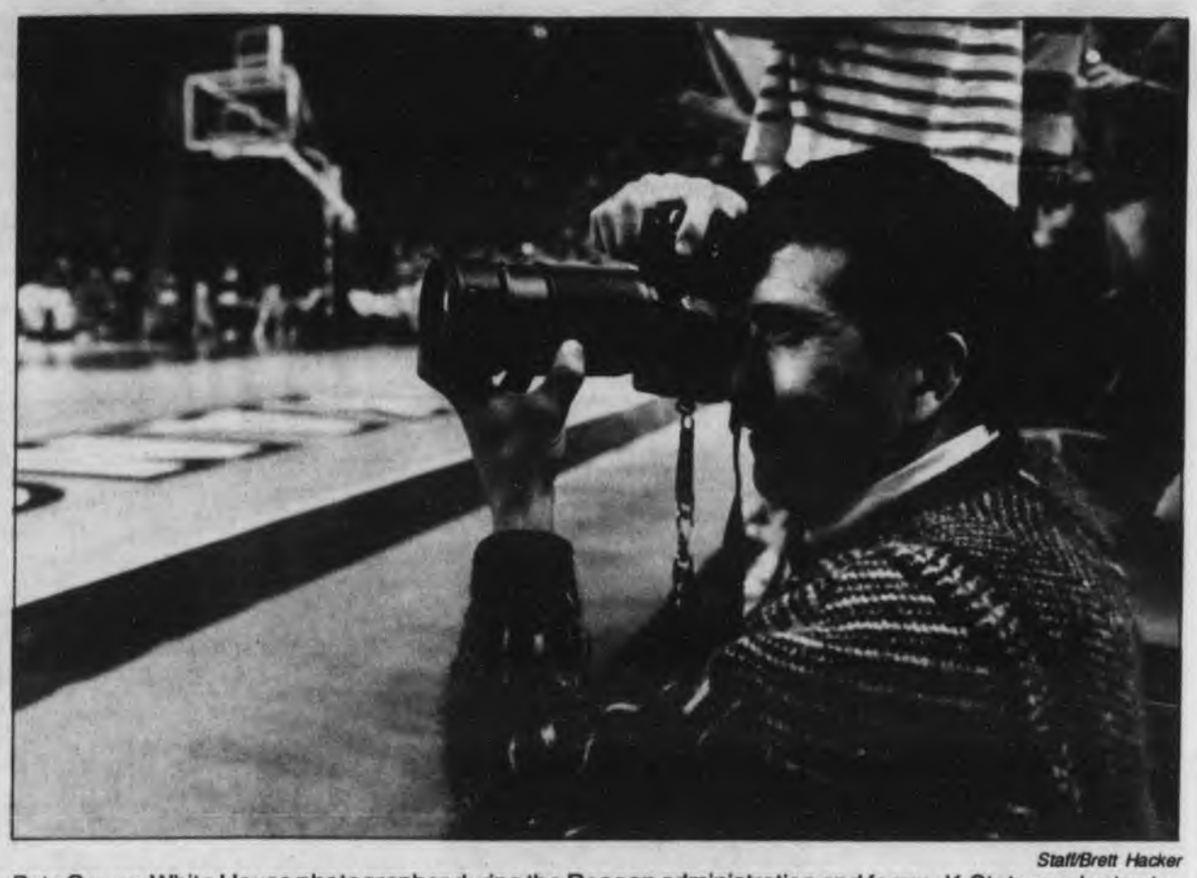
White House photographer tells about experiences

By Lisa Pfannenstiel
Features Editor

Spending one day with the former President Reagan may have been an honor for any individual, but for Pete Souza, taking the former president's photos for six and a half years became part of an everyday routine.

Souza, a former K-State graduate student, was one of the four White House photographers who served during Reagan's term. Souza not only captured the Reagan's everyday expressions during Oval Office meetings, he traveled with him and his staff to document the Reagan years.

After leaving the White House Jan. 20, Souza visited K-State last week and shared his experiences with students.



Souza said he not only photographed Reagan reciting the pledge of allegiance with grade school children, he was able to capture the overwhelming emotion on Reagan's face as he was comforting the families of the sailors who died when the USS Stark was attacked in the Persian Gulf.

In accompanying Reagan to the summit convention with Mikhail Gorbachev in Reykjavik, Iceland, Souza said he witnessed the president's frustration with the progress of the talks.

"It took a lot to get (the president) angry," he said. "The angriest I ever saw him was in Reykjavik at the summit ... his blood was boiling. He was angry at Gorbachev and he was angry because he felt he let a lot of people down."

Reagan was usually a pretty easy-going guy, Souza said, but got aggravated with Congress sometimes.

Souza said access to the "behind-the-scenes coverage" was an advantage of being a White House photographer. Wire service or magazine photographers often only had the option of "gang photos" in which everyone fought for the best picture at the same time.

Staff/Brett Hacker

Pete Souza, White House photographer during the Reagan administration and former K-State graduate student, shoots the K-State-Iowa State basketball game Thursday night in Bramlage Coliseum.

The president became oblivious to the presence of the White House photographers, who made special efforts to use the quietest camera equipment and natural light as much as possible.

"We would try to be a fly on the wall as much as we could, and try not to disturb the proceeding," he said.

If a photo shoot wasn't scheduled and Reagan needed a picture taken, an official would contact the photographer immediately, Souza said. The photographers' work area was directly beneath the president's study.

"We could zoom upstairs in 30 seconds — kind of like going from the photo lab in Kedzie (basement) to the newsroom," he said.

Some of most difficult pictures to take were of the summit conferences, he said. The KGB agents would pull Souza out of the meeting room, severely limiting his access to photo opportunities.

On the first day of the Moscow summit, the Reagans went to a pedestrian mall to meet the Soviet people, which Souza said was against the requests of the secret service.

"The KGB got way out of control," Souza said. "It was crazy. I never feared for my life, but I feared for my body."

One of the Associated Press photographers had his camera smashed in his face by the KGB.

"The KGB couldn't handle something that wasn't controlled," he said.

Unlike the experience in Moscow, Souza enjoyed shooting photos of Reagan's personal life.

The former president is human like the rest of us, Souza said, showing a slide of Reagan with arm cocked and ready to throw a paper airplane from the roof of Century Plaza.

A paper airplane wasn't all the president wanted to throw. Souza said the president always wanted to throw the first pitch of the Chicago Cubs game.

His staff made the arrangements without telling the president. During a trip to Chicago, Reagan's motorcade traveled directly to Wrigley's Field. Reagan threw the first pitch of the Cub's game and then sat in the press box and covered two innings

Protest over book kills 5, injures 65

By The Associated Press

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — Police fired on hundreds of protesters Sunday who stormed a U.S. government office to demand the United States ban a novel they consider offensive to Moslems. At least five people died and 65 were injured, doctors said.

Police repeatedly fired semi-automatic weapons, rifles and shotguns at charging protesters who yelled "American dogs!" and hurled rocks and bricks during three hours of fierce clashes.

The rioting erupted when more than 2,000 fundamentalists tried to march to the U.S. Information Center to demand the United States ban "Satanic Verses," a novel by Salman Rushdie.

Pakistan banned the novel on grounds it offends Moslems by suggesting the prophet Mohammed was fallible. India also banned the novel.

In Kennebunkport, Maine, where President Bush was spending the weekend, White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said U.S. officials were monitoring the Islamabad situation closely. Fitzwater said the national security adviser, Brent Scowcroft, telephoned Bush early Sunday to tell him of the riot.

"God is great!" protesters screamed as they smashed windows and started fires after driving off scores of police.

They tore down the American flag at the center and danced in delight as it was burned, along with effigies representing the Indian-born Rushdie and the United States. "Hang Salman Rushdie," one man yelled.

Three U.S. diplomats and 15 Pakistanis employeed at the center were in the building at the time but were not hurt, U.S. diplomats said.

"There was a pitched battle going on outside," said Kent Obee, head of the center, which contains a public library and dispenses information about the United States.

Doctors at area hospitals, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said at least five people had been killed by police gunfire and 65 protesters shot and wounded.

They said the injured included Moslem theology students and about 20 police hit by rocks or beaten by the rampaging crowd.

Police arrested at least 25 protesters, and angry officers were seen beating and kicking some of those arrested.

Some protesters attacked the nearby American Express travel agency, smashing windows and starting a fire before police drove them off.

Enraged demonstrators also attacked three Western journalists, including two Associated Press correspondents and an Atlanta Constitution correspondent. They were not injured.

Police in blue helmets and armed with bamboo canes and metal shields initially tried to disperse the crowds with tear gas and batons, but the mob hurled the tear gas canisters back and repeatedly charged police.

Police fired in the air and then began shooting into the crowd as protesters advanced. Other officers ran to escape the mob.

Protest leaders said "Satanic Verses" should be banned in the United States and all other nations.

K-State duo sparks win over Huskers

'Cat guards get 50 in rout of Nebraska

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

K-State seemed to know that it couldn't tangle with Nebraska's pair of 7-footers, Richard King and Kelly Lively, underneath the basket. So, the Wildcats relied on the outside punch of guards Steve Henson and LaKeith Humphrey.

And the Wildcat duo responded, combining for 50 points (25 each) on 15 of 25 shooting from the floor and 13 of 14 from the free throw line when they gunned down the Cornhuskers, 80-66, Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum.

The 'Cats, who sank 10 of their first 15 field goals of the game to take a 27-19 lead, hit only two of their last 10 of the first half, allowing the Huskers to take a one-point advantage at intermission, 32-31. K-State, however, was able to outscore Nebraska 22-10 over the last 6:21 of the contest and cruised the rest of the way.

"I'm not into comparing people, but I certainly like the job (Henson and Humphrey) do for us. They do an outstanding job and give us great leadership."

— Lon Kruger men's basketball coach

"Obviously the first half, especially the last three minutes, Nebraska really turned it up a little bit," said Wildcat coach Lon Kruger.

"I was especially pleased in the second half with eight, nine, 10 minutes to go, to get the break on three or four possessions there and gain a little bit of a margin that we played with the rest of the way."

With 6:21 left to play, the 'Cats held on to a slim 58-56 advantage. K-State's Tony Massop was fouled by King and went to the line for a one-and-one, making the first shot and missing the second.

Mark Dobbins rebounded the ball and passed it inside to Lance Simmons, who sank a shot as he was fouled. Simmons hit the free throw to complete the three-point play, and suddenly K-State had a 62-56 cushion.

"There were two or three big plays," said Kruger. "When Lance got fouled and finished the three-point play, that was a real critical stretch. Some of LaKeith's steals, Steve's three pointers back-to-back, all those created a little bit of margin."

The 'Cats were able to outrebound the taller Husker squad, 33-30, even though Nebraska entered the game as the best rebounding squad in the conference. Nebraska's twin towers, 7-foot-2 King and 7-foot Lively combined for only eight boards.

"(Nebraska) is so big inside," said Kruger. "Like always, we tried to take it inside. I thought Lance (Simmons) especially had some success in there, and Tony (Massop) came off the bench and did a good job. When you've got two 7-footers in there and Fred (McCoy) and Lance at 6-foot-6 or 6-foot-5, you have to give them something there. It really makes a difference."

The play of Humphrey and Henson was the key. Besides the 50 points, they also combined for 11 assists and seven rebounds. Humphrey had seven steals in the game, a K-State season high in that department.

"I'm not into comparing people, but I certainly like the job (Henson and Humphrey) do for us," said Kruger. "They do an outstanding job and give us great leadership.

"They really handle late-game situations well, and when you have two guards that can hit free throws like these guys shoot free throws, the ball's in their hands most of the time down the stretch. I've got a lot of confidence in them."

"We're just trying to look at each game one at a time," said Henson. "We feel like we've stepped it up the last two games and done a pretty good job. I think we're doing some things well and if we can continue to do that, I think our season looks pretty good."

The win raised the 'Cats to 14-7 in the season and gives them sole possession of fourth place in the Big Eight Conference with a 5-4 mark. The Huskers are last in the conference with a 1-7 record and are 13-11 overall.

Mizzou survives week of surprises

By The Associated Press

COLUMBIA, Mo. — Missouri basketball fans, with one coach suspended and another hospitalized, are wondering what in the world can happen next to their third-ranked team.

Coach Norm Stewart collapsed Thursday with a bleeding ulcer, one day after his top assistant was suspended in the first NCAA scandal in school history.

Stewart remained hospitalized Friday in Oklahoma City in stable condition.

His team, 20-4, prepared to continue its soap opera season in a nationally televised home game Saturday against Kansas with Rich Daly, a recruiting specialist, as the only fulltime coach on the bench. Daly coached the team Thursday night in its 112-105 loss at Oklahoma, which cost the Tigers first place in the Big Eight.

A spokesperson at Hillcrest Hospital in Oklahoma City said she had no way of knowing when Stewart, 53, might be released. The eighth-winningest active coach in college basketball collapsed and went into mild convulsions on the team plane en route to Oklahoma.

"His condition is unchanged. He is resting comfortably and in stable condition," said spokesperson Ann Hill. "We've not received any message from the doctor giving us any indication when he might be released."

Stewart collapsed about 14 hours after university authorities decided to suspend with pay his No. 1 assistant, Bob Sundvold, who was captured on tape talking about buying an airline ticket for a former Missouri player, P.J. Mays, and asking Mays' mother to help him deny it.

Mays, whose scholarship was revoked last fall and now attends a junior college, has also charged that he and other freshmen-to-be in the Missouri program received cash payments of $100 from Sundvold.

The NCAA is awaiting results of an internal investigation by Missouri. School officials are making no public statements on the matter, which erupted on Monday in a copyright story by the Kansas City Times. But the violations, if proven to the satisfaction of the NCAA infractions committee, could result in the first sanctions ever for a school that's long boasted of its clean record.

Even before the Sundvold controversy broke, a series of incidents and personal crises had enveloped the team.

Stewart's wife, Virginia, collapsed during a game in December and has undergone two major operations this month. She is in a Columbia, Mo., hospital. Missouri authorities have declined to explain the nature of her illness but say her situation is not life-threatening.

Earlier in the season, fans at Nebraska became incensed when they said Stewart turned to them in the final seconds of a game and insulted Coach Danny Nee.

In January, a reporter for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch said Stewart had made comments that the reporter construed as threatening to his 1-year-old son. Stewart denied making any threats and that incident, too, is under review by the university.

"We've had so much stuff happen to us, we were just thankful we were here at the arena to play," Missouri center Gary Leonard said after Oklahoma rallied for the Thursday victory. "I think the Pioneers had an easier time getting to Oklahoma than we did."

"I didn't know what I was doing out there," said Missouri guard Lee Coward. "We played a little shaky out there without Coach settling us down. Coach Daly did a great job, but he wasn't used to that kind of activity."

Controversy and the crusty Stewart have been frequent companions during his long, successful tenure. His 28-year head coaching record is 517-262 and in 22 years at Missouri he is 420-221. A 1956 Missouri graduate, Stewart's teams have averaged 20 victories for the past 18 seasons and won five Big Eight championships.

The only thing to elude Stewart has been the national recognition that comes with success in the NCAA Tournament. The best a Stewart team has ever done was the Midwest Regional finals in 1976. His 1980 and '82 teams reached the Midwest semifinals. Most frustrating for Tiger fans have been the last three years when Missouri was knocked in the first round.

The current team is generally regarded as Stewart's finest collection of athletes. They include senior guard Byron Irvin, the No. 3 scorer in the Big Eight, 6-foot-4 freshman star Anthony Peeler, and a group of experienced forwards and centers who helped make the Tigers the first Division I team this year to reach 20 victories.

The last time Daly coached a game prior to Thursday night was at Pensacola, Fla., Junior College 12 years ago. Daly was playing cards with Stewart on the plane when he fell ill.

"He didn't give us any warning," Daly said. "All of a sudden he said, 'I don't feel good,' and that was it. He just turned white."

Stewart recovered enough to watch the game on television from his hospital bed and called the team a few minutes before it took the floor.

Daly said he feared at first that Stewart was having a heart attack. As the crisis seemed to abate, he said, it helped put the events of the previous day regarding Sundvold in perspective.

"What happened yesterday is nothing like today," Daly said.

Jones qualifies for national meet

From Staff and Wire Reports

Freshman sprinter Markeya Jones became the fifth K-State track athlete to qualify for the NCAA Indoor championships Friday, highlighting several record-breaking performances for the Wildcat track squad at the Husker Invitational in Lincoln, Neb., this past weekend.

Jones qualified for Saturday's finals of the 200-meter dash with a national-qualifying and school-record time of 24.16 seconds. She then went on to finish second in the finals to Pauline Davis, the defending NCAA champion.

Junior Ray Hill won the 55-meters for the third time this season, and also ran a Big Eight Conference season-best time of 6.20.

Another freshman, Janet Haskin, turned in a solid performance in the 3,000-meters, setting a Husker Invitational record with a time of 9:31.98.

K-State coach John Capriotti also had high hopes for the men's mile relay team, but the squad ran into some bad luck.

"We had a pretty rough going here," Capriotti said."We were leading after two legs, and then got bumped off the track." The team finished fifth with a time of 3:14.

Dan O'Mara continued to dominate the shot put event with his fourth win in as many meets. O'Mara's put of 59-9 was also the fourth time that he has thrown at distances greater than the national qualifying mark.

"All in all, I thought we had a real good day," Capriotti said. "We had several seasonal bests, and another national qualifier in Markeya Jones. I was extremely pleased with the meet."

Humphrey terrorizing Big 8

By Scott Paske
Collegian Reporter

Nebraska coach Danny Nee was quick to offer the reason his Huskers dropped an 80-66 decision to K-State on Saturday.

"I thought the difference in the game was the two guys who just left the (interview) room," Nee said, as he entered the interview room doorway at Bramlage Coliseum. "Steve Henson and LaKeith Humphrey were domineering in their play at both ends of the floor."

Those feelings have been echoed by several opposing coaches in recent post-game interviews. The junior guard tandem have been terrors since Big Eight play began, leading the 'Cats in scoring, assists, free-throw percentages and minutes played.

Saturday, the two tossed in 25 points apiece, with Humphrey adding a season-high seven steals and seven assists. Nee also credited the duo with taking Nebraska away from its game plan during the second half, in which K-State outscored the Huskers 49-34.

"(Their) guard play at both ends of the floor caused us not to run what we wanted to run," Nee said. "They just did an excellent job in all facets of the game."

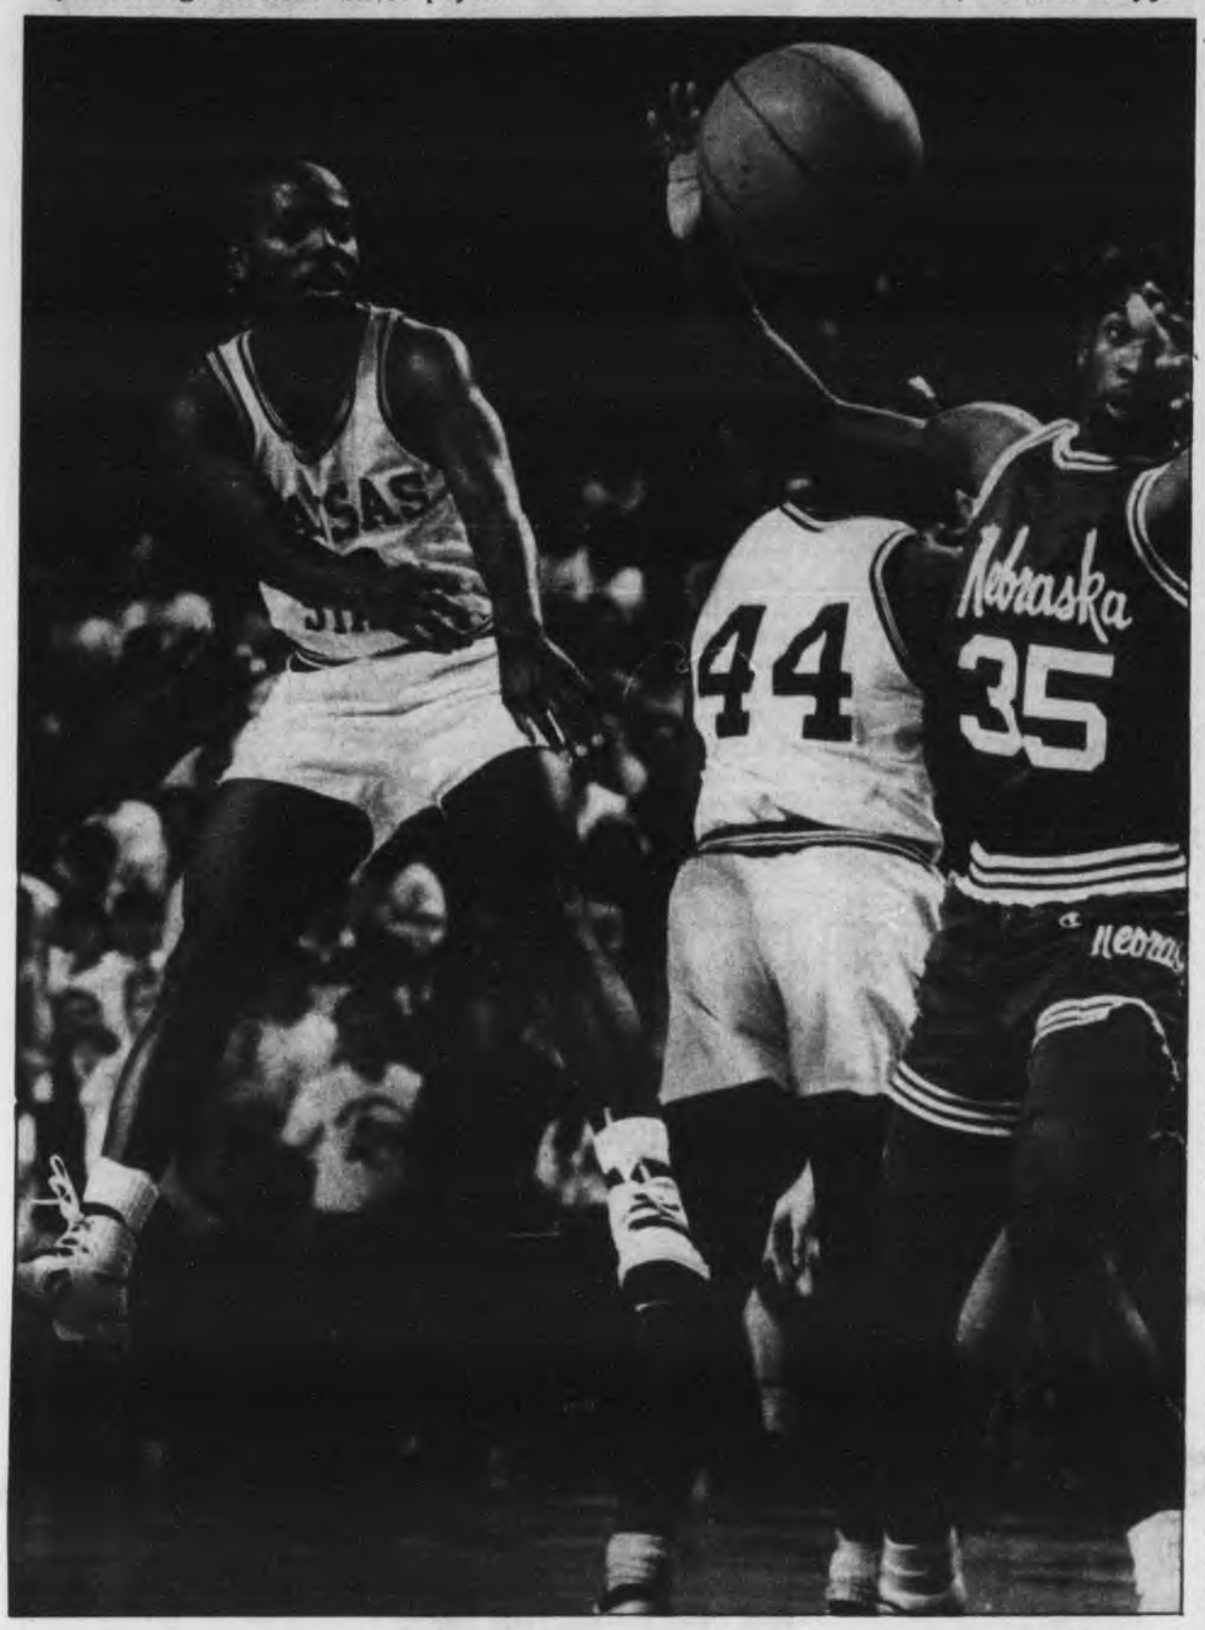
Humphrey, a 6-foot-1 transfer from Barton County Community College, has provided some needed scoring support for Henson and center Fred McCoy. In the last four games, Humphrey has led the 'Cats in scoring three times, averaging 21.5 points per game. He has reached double figures in 12 of K-State's last 13 games, but gives his backcourt mate credit for the increase in production.

"Other teams look to stop Steve, and Coach (Kruger) wants me to step up and complement him," Humphrey said. "I really enjoy doing that."

For Kruger, the aid in the scoring column from his point guard has been greatly welcome, but the K-State coach highlighted other areas of Humphrey's play.

"LaKeith has all the tools to be a good defensive player," Kruger said. "He has real good balance and excellent quickness, and he's never been a one-dimensional player."

Kruger said he never hesitates in giving Humphrey the toughest defensive assignments. Recently, Humphrey has turned in impressive performances, such as his play against Oklahoma's All-American candidate Mookie Blaylock, Missouri's Lee Coward and Nebraska's Eric Johnson, holding each to less than his season scoring averages.



While Humphrey has become the progressive player for K-State, Henson has maintained consistency. His outing against Nebraska moved him into the 20th spot on the all-time K-State scoring list, surpassing former Wildcat center Ced Price. It also marked the 10th time this season that Henson has crossed the 20-point barrier. The McPherson native is averaging slightly less than 18 points per game.

Both guards agreed their compatibility as a backcourt unit has developed dramatically since the beginning of the year.

"Playing with Steve helps me a lot because I know at least five or six times out of 10 that I pass it to him, he's going to get the shot down," Humphrey said.

"LaKeith can really go and get himself a shot whenever he wants to," Henson said. "Whenever one of us is hot, it's not something we have to talk about. It's something we just feel." Henson, who leads the nation in free throw shooting with 94.7 percent, said the 'Cats are using a game-by-game attitude to chase the upper division teams.

"We're trying to look at each game one at a time," said Henson. "We've stepped up the last couple of games and done a real good job."

OU likely choice for No. 1 again

By The Associated Press

In college basketball this season, it's not good to be the king. No sooner do you get to the throne than someone comes up and lops off your head.

Arizona became the third team in three weeks to reach the top and lose within a week when it lost 82-80 to No. 5 Oklahoma Sunday.

Since Oklahoma beat No. 3 Missouri this week, second-ranked Georgetown lost to Pittsburgh and fourth-ranked Louisville lost to Florida State and UCLA, the Sooners probably will retake the top spot in the Associated Press poll Monday.

"We volunteered last week," Oklahoma coach Billy Tubbs said. "Any time you need us for No. 1, we'll do it. Someone's got to do it."

Stacey King scored 24 points and Oklahoma overcame a seven-point second-half deficit.

Tubbs thinks his team, which also beat Arizona in the national semifinals last spring, should be No. 1.

"When you really got down to it, and I had to be fair, I'd probably put us in there," he said.

In other games Sunday involving ranked teams, UCLA beat No. 4 Louisville 77-75, No. 6 North Carolina beat Virginia 85-67, No. 13 Indiana beat Purdue 64-62, No. 19 Nevada-Las Vegas beat No. 17 North Carolina State 79-70 and No. 18 Stanford beat Washington 82-74 in overtime.

On Saturday, Pittsburgh beat No. 2 Georgetown 79-74, No. 3 Missouri beat Kansas 93-80, No. 7 Illinois beat Northwestern 86-69, Wisconsin beat No. 8 Iowa 65-54, No. 9 Syracuse beat St. John's 92-69, Minnesota beat No. 10 Michigan 88-80, No. 11 Seton Hall beat Villanova 83-77, No. 14 Duke beat Maryland 86-60, No. 15 West Virginia beat Penn State 100-67, No. 16 Ohio State beat Michigan State 81-75 and No. 20 Georgia Tech beat Wake Forest 75-70.

In beating Arizona, Oklahoma won its 27th consecutive home game. Sean Elliott scored 26 points for Arizona, 18-3, which had its 10-game winning streak snapped.

UCLA 77, No. 4 Louisville 75

Pervis Ellison was called for goaltending on Pooh Richardson's 8-footer with one second left and Louisville lost for the second time in a week.

The Bruins, 16-5, scored five points in the last 1:10 to overcome a 75-72 deficit, taking advantage of two bad passes by the Cardinals, 17-5.

Trevor Wilson made two free throws with 70 seconds remaining. Kenny Payne threw away a pass and Derrick Martin tied it on a free throw with 41 seconds to go.

Richardson picked off Everick Sullivan's pass with 10 seconds left and took his shot, which Ellison swatted away. Referee Willis McGunkin made the goaltending call immediately.

No. 6 N. Carolina 85, Virginia 67

Steve Bucknall scored 19 points as the Tar Heels avenged a 106-83 loss to the Cavaliers last month.

North Carolina, 19-5 and 6-3 in the Atlantic Coast Conference, made eight of its first 11 shots while Virginia made just two of its first 12. The Cavaliers, 13-8 and 5-4, never got the deficit below seven points after that.

No. 13 Indiana 64, Purdue 62

Jay Edwards made a game-winning 14-foot jumper with four seconds left, giving Purdue its sixth loss in seven games.

The Hoosiers, 20-5 overall and 10-1 in the Big Ten, rallied from an 11-point deficit midway through the second half and won their 14th consecutive home game over two seasons.

Purdue, 10-13 and 3-7, led 59-51 with 4:56 left before Indiana scored six straight points. Joe Hillman's 3-pointer gave Indiana a 62-60 lead with 1:02 left. Tony Jones' bank shot with 27 seconds left tied it.

No. 19 UNLV 89, No. 17 N.C. State 80

David Butler scored 21 points, including 15 in the first half, as the Runnin' Rebels took a 49-34 halftime lead.

Stacey Augmon added 20 points for Nevada-Las Vegas, 16-6, who led 26-9 midway through the first half.

No. 18 Stanford 82, Wash. 74, OT

Stanford's Todd Lichti scored 19 points, including half of his team's 16 points in overtime.

Tennis team wins dual, 6-3, avenges loss to Texas Tech

By Carolyn Holcroft
Sports Writer

The K-State women's tennis team completed its first dual match of the season Saturday with a solid victory over Texas Tech at Topeka's Wood Valley Racquet Club.

Going into the meet, Coach Steve Bietau expected strong competition from Tech — the last time the two schools met the Wildcats were defeated 9-0, This time, however, K-State took the match 6-3 to record the first win ever against a Southwest Conference school.

"The team played very well. It was a tough, hard-fought match," Bietau said. "I was also pleased with the fact that we were able to win all four of the three-set matches we were involved in."

Although he felt the play was somewhat inconsistent at times and some new weaknesses were exposed this weekend, Bietau is not at all unhappy about the way the season is going.

"I was pleased with the overall effort we got from everyone on the team. There were some spots we didn't play well and still managed to find a way to win," he said. "This was a very good step for us. I'm pleased with where we are at this point in the season."

As expected, K-State received strong leadership from juniors Marijke Nel and Valerie Rive. Also showing some outstanding play were juniors Helen Schildknecht and Sara Hancock.

K-State won the top four singles matches. Nel defeated Jamie McCaffrey in three sets, 6-3, 3-6, 6-2, in the No. 1 singles match. Schildknecht took just two sets to defeat Mallory Grantham, 6-2, 6-2, in No. 2 singles, while Hancock needed three sets in the No. 3 match to get past Rebeca Naverez, 6-4, 2-6, 6-2, as did Rive at No. 4, defeating Amy Ryan, 6-2, 1-6, 6-4.

Rive and Nel then turned around and combined to take the No. 1 doubles title.

Singles results:
No. 1 — Nel defeated McCaffrey 6-3, 3-6, 6-2.
No. 2 — Schildknecht defeated Grantham 6-2, 6-2.
No. 3 — Hancock defeated Naverez 6-4, 2-6, 6-2.
No. 4 — Rive defeated Ryan 6-2, 1-6, 6-4.
No. 5 — Burcham lost to Biggerstaff 6-1, 6-3.
No. 6 — Annika Emtell lost to Hamilton 6-3, 6-4.

Doubles results:
No. 1 — Rive-Nel defeated Grantham-Isaac 6-2, 5-7, 6-4.
No. 2 — Schildknecht and Miste Bitner lost to Navarez and Ryan, 6-3, 6-4.
No. 3 — Hancock and Burcham defeated Biggerstaff and Hamilton 6-3, 7-6.

Lady Cats lose second straight at Nebraska; Stephens gets 34

From Staff and Wire Reports

The K-State women's basketball team picked the wrong time to travel to Lincoln, Neb., to face the Lady Huskers.

Last week just happened to be the week Nebraska's Amy Stephens was on a roll, and she didn't stop Saturday.

The senior guard scored 34 points, including six three-pointers, as Nebraska handed the Lady Cats their second straight road loss, 68-56.

Stephens, who scored 40 points Wednesday night in the Lady Huskers' 83-80 win over Oklahoma, took most of her 25 shots from beyond the three-point arc, connecting on 6 of 18 treys.

"She played 38 minutes and her feet didn't stop moving the entire time she was on the floor," said K-State coach Matilda Mossman of Stephens.

The Lady Cats, on the other hand, were not enjoying the same kind of evening Stephens was. K-State hit only 21 of 60 floor shots for 35 percent and had only eight field goals the entire second half.

"They really weren't that bad of shots, but we just shot a little too quickly and then didn't get any offensive rebounds," Mossman said. "Plus, we missed a lot of short shots inside."

Despite having a poor shooting night, K-State was able to stay within one point of the Lady Huskers at the intermission, 33-32. Nadira Hazim was key in helping the Lady Cats counter Stephens' 22 first-half points, scoring 11 points of her own.

In the second half, it seemed the Lady Cats were going to take advantage of a Nebraska cold streak that saw the Lady Huskers go scoreless for the first 4:32 of the second half. K-State, though, failed to put together much of a run, scoring just three points before Kelly Hubert ended the Lady Huskers' drought with a short jumper to pull Nebraska within one, 36-35.

K-State remained fairly close throughout most of the second half until a Kim Harris layup gave Nebraska a 56-46 lead with 6:13 left.

K-State falls to 16-7 overall and are 6-4 in Big Eight Conference play.

Sports lucky to have people similar to Crash Davis

Svoboda on Sports

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Columnist

Everyone should be so lucky as to know a Crash Davis.

Davis, the minor league baseball player portrayed by Kevin Costner in the smash hit "Bull Durham," was the kind of guy you'd definitely want to have on your side in a fight.

Intensely loyal, stubborn, wise, ready to lend a helping hand to someone younger and not quite as smart — that was Crash Davis.

There aren't enough Crash Davises in this world.

In the film, Davis was used by the major league club he worked for to help bring along a young pitching prospect named Ebby Calvin "Nuke" LaLoosh.

Nuke wasn't exactly wise to anything. In fact, he was more of a wise-guy than anything.

Davis, who'd been to the majors and had made every stop in between, was to be Nuke's mentor. He ended up being his mentor, big brother, confidant, catcher and a helluva lot more.

In the end, Nuke made it to the big leagues and Crash got released. The kid milked the old man for all he was worth, and it paid off with a trip to the "show" for the phenom with the "million dollar arm and the five cent head."

Crash, however, wasn't bitter. In fact, it seemed as if Crash was ready to accept the fact that his job now, as beneath him as it may have been a few seasons before, was to help bring the youngsters along.

Helping someone achieve what he never could was what Crash was all about. His chase for the dream was over, and it was time for a chase of another sort.

In today's world of big money professional athletics, guys like Crash Davis are very hard to find.

What's it worth to a veteran down on his luck to bring along a rookie who's likely to make three times as much in his first two seasons as the veteran did in his entire career?

What it was worth to Crash Davis — and what it has been worth to guys like Hal McRae, Jan Stenerud and Julius Erving over the past several years — really probably can't be put into words.

McRae, Stenerud and Erving all ruled their respective professions at one time or another, but late in their careers they, too, became Crash Davises. Their careers became secondary so that others could go on to even better things.

This type of behavior isn't restricted to professional athletics. Ever heard of Mark Nelson and Dana Dimel? If you follow K-State athletics, you probably have.

Both are recent K-State grads. Nelson was Steve Henson's backup at point guard for two seasons and is now a graduate assistant coach for the K-State men's basketball team. Dimel, a member of Stan Parrish's Wildcat football team, is now a member of Bill Snyder's K-State coaching staff after having served on Parrish's coaching staff.

Nelson and Dimel, though they did several things well enough to be collegiate athletes, weren't possibly as gifted as some of those whom they played with or against.

But that wasn't important to them. As senior leaders, both assumed roles of player, teacher, friend, confidant — both became Crash Davises.

Following the end of their playing careers, they both moved on to coach. The old axiom "those who can't play, coach" doesn't apply to these two. Both could play, but both realized that helping others become better was a way they could continue to chase their ever-elusive dreams.

K-State baseball coach Mike Clark said something recently about what made coaching special to him that would have made Crash Davis proud.

Clark said: "When the light goes on, and that player finally has it click about what it is you've been trying to teach him, and then he goes out and executes it, there's no better feeling in the world."

Crash Davis, Dr. J, Mark Nelson, Dana Dimel, Mike Clark and others like them are few and far between. I respect those kind of people, and can't think of a better thing to be referred to than as "another Crash Davis."

It's just too bad that for all the Crash Davises in the world, there aren't enough people stopping along the way to say "thanks."

If there were, there would likely be a whole lot more people like Crash giving of themselves while not looking for much in return — except possibly for the turning on of a light.

Food habits studied

Researchers identify eating trends

By Alan Wilds
Staff Writer

Why do people eat what they eat? Four faculty members and one graduate assistant are trying to find the answer in an ongoing research project called "Foodways."

"What we are attempting to do is understand what some of the underlying dimensions are that seem to determine the kinds of food choices people make," said George Peters, professor of social anthropology.

Leon Rappoport, professor of psychology; Ron Downey, member of the planning and evaluation services staff; Lin-Huff Corzine, professor of social anthropology; and Teri Hardister, graduate student in psychology, are working with Peters in studying people of all ages to determine which psychological and social factors influence what people eat.

Peters said many people understand the caloric content of food as well as what is good and not good for them.

"The problem is people don't always follow that advice," he said.

Peters said the research is not intended to displace any information or knowledge that people have gained from nutrition science, but he said it is a "necessary supplement."

"I think nutrition scientists are to be lauded for their excellent work in this area," Peters said.

The two major emphases of nutrition science Peters said are biological, which includes health and physiological aspects of food, and pathological, which includes eating disorders such as anorexia and bulimia.

He said the research does not actually involve observing what people eat but rather interviewing and surveying people to find out the way they think about what they eat.

"At some point along the line, we will try to draw a connection with what people think about food and the choices they actually make," Peters said.

Downey, who handles data processing for the group, illustrated one of the ways in which people think about food.

"If one aspect of a meal is changed, it can change the concept of the entire meal for some people," Downey said.

Peters said the group has outlined four dimensions of how people they have studied think about food, such as health, pleasure, convenience and tradition.

Of the four dimensions, tradition is the hardest to study because the group's research has not had much ethnic diversity thus far, Peters said. The people they have dealt with have been mostly from the Midwest, although they are working informally with colleagues in Arizona and Texas to obtain ethnic data.

Corzine said food carries a social atmosphere with it, and for many elderly people in nursing homes it becomes difficult when suddenly their meals are prepared in a sterile and unsocial atmosphere.

"Food can be social, psychological and symbolic, and elderly people's foods are very hard to change," Peters said.

Corzine said one of the most interesting aspects for her is how one person can control an entire family's eating habits.

"It is fascinating to find out how children and adults choose the foods they do," Corzine said.

Downey said by dealing with food as a meal and getting people to tell them what kinds of factors influence their decisions they can see how lifestyles are driven by what foods they select.

The group has also published several writings on their work, some of which have been presented at sociology conventions, Corzine said.

"Each of us, in turn, has taken one paper on as the number one author and presented it at our meetings," she said.

Most of the writing has been focused on food and aging, Peters said. The published work outlines their general approach, including one paper titled "Age and Gender and Food Cognition."

"We are attempting not only to talk about behavorial differences, but also how people think about those differences," he said.

Aside from their interest in the subject, the area has applied value for emphasis on food programs for older adults, Peters said.

Hardister is currently working on questionnaires with Rappoport to determine children's eating habits.

Corzine said school lunches and nursing home meals could also benefit from knowing peoples' thoughts about what they eat.

Hardister said she has enjoyed her work so far and it has been very interesting to find that people do have specific ways they look at food.

Elvis Costello unknown despite unique qualities

By Doug Fall
Collegian Reviewer

Although Elvis Costello has been recording albums since 1977, he still hasn't achieved overwhelming commercial success. With his latest effort, "Spike," Costello continues to achieve a high quality level of music, but will probably remain relatively obscure.

Critics have loved Elvis Costello from the first peep he made. His bespectacled, frail appearance hides a much bigger person who writes music without being influenced by anything he doesn't want. In the Aug. 27 issue of Rolling Stone, three of his albums were listed among the 100 best of the past 20 years, although their sales would indicate otherwise.

Review

Costello's unique sound has definitely evolved. His musical sound, which originated as pleasantly mellow, became harsher, then backtracked to the original, rich sound. On this album, Costello is not backed by his band, The Attractions. "Spike" features Costello, with artists such as Paul McCartney and Chrissie Hynde contributing their talents on several songs.

"Spike" is 15 greatly varied songs — most of which are quite mellow — featuring Costello on piano and acoustic guitar, with a few instruments in the background.

"Stalin Malone" is an instrumental piece performed by The Dirty Dozen Band and is quite an atypical sound from the normal rock record. Several of the songs are upbeat, sounding similar to his earlier material.

"Let Him Dangle" is a ballad describing the case of Derek Bentley, a man who was found guilty of accomplice to murder and sentenced to death. Although he didn't commit the actual murder, he was hanged. Taking a stand on current social issues, which he often does, Costello paints a stark picture of capital punishment.

"Baby Plays Around" is a straight-forward song about Costello and his cheating girlfriend. "And so it seems I've always been the last to know / To hold on to that girl, I had to let her go." On this, it is just Costello playing an acoustic guitar, with which he sets a quiet, contemplative and sad mood. Costello is a master of matching the tone of songs with his lyrics.

Billy Joel has said Elvis Costello is his favorite lyricist. This remark isn't as strange as it seems to be, as Joel's and Costello's lyrics are quite similar, although Costello's are more poetic. Even more ironic is Joel's most recent hairstyle, which is almost identical to the one that Costello has always had.

In the song "Satellite," with Hynde supplying occasional backing vocals, Costello deftly addresses a subject that would be shocking if not for his talented songwriting ability. The song is about a man's hidden fantasies directed toward subjects on TV or in a magazine. "And with his face pressed to the screen / he muttered words he'd never dare to say if she could see him." The song is almost haunting in the way it discreetly handles a touchy subject. In this song, Costello proves once again he is unmatched in the lyric department.

With or without The Attractions backing him up, Elvis Costello can produce a remarkable album. "Spike," his 12th album in 11 years, maintains his high standard of music and should reinforce the support he garners from the critics and his growing number of fans.

UPC's Late Night offers entertaining variety

Comedian, band highlight events

By Doug Fall
Collegian Reviewer

As part of the Union Program Council's "Late Night Down Under" activities, Hugh Fink and That Statue Moved performed in the Union Catskeller Friday night amidst a mock Australian Outback setting.

Starting at 7:30 p.m., Hugh Fink entertained a crowd of about 50 people. Although there was some apprehension on the part of the crowd, it was quickly dispelled by Fink's quick wit and slightly eclectic sense of humor.

Review

Fink wore a shirt promoting himself, but across the front was painted, "You mock what you fear, dude." He used this phrase throughout his show, quite often with hilarious results.

From Elvis, to Bob Dylan, to baseball, to his own name, he cleverly covered all kinds of topics. The crowd enjoyed it all. The only time he hit a wrong note with the audience was during his routine about Kansas and its small towns. The crowd, mostly coming from places similar to what he described, squirmed in their seats until he finished.

A unique aspect of Fink's routine that separates him from most other stand-up comedians is his violin. Near the end of his show, he brought out the instrument and commented on his childhood experiences with it and its link to rock'n'roll.

Saying that rock stars get paid millions of dollars to scream "Rock'n'roll!," classical violinists should get in the act and yell "Romanticism!" or the like.

Fink's sense of what is funny and his ability to achieve it without relying on vulgarisms or offensive language was impressive. He was able to entertain without resorting to cheap jokes.

As he was billed, Fink was truly a "comedy virtuoso" with his wit and his violin.

About 90 minutes and one encore later, That Statue Moved took the stage with a rousing rendition of "London," by The Smiths. The audience, while similar in number but of slightly different composition, came to hear the band that has been earning a name for itself around Manhattan this past year.

That Statue Moved played practically without a break for three hours. During the latter part of the first set, the crowd relaxed and started to dance, continuing for the rest of the show.

The band played numbers from bands such as The Cure, Midnight Oil, R.E.M. and U2 with impressive preciseness. The lead singer, Marty Mosier, could imitate almost every singer's voice he attempted and was complimented by the rest of the band's ability to sound almost like the original song.

One of the highlights of the show was a rendition of Edie Brickell and The New Bohemians' recent single "What I am." Everything was perfect. Steve Guiot's guitar, Dave Burdett's bass, Darren Keller's drums, even Mosier's voice imitated the song to practical exactness.

Other songs that brought a good crowd response were U2's "Desire," The Police's "Message in a Bottle," The Smiths' "Stop Me If You Think That You've Heard This One Before," and "Blister in the Sun" by The Violent Femmes, complete with the famous decrescendo in the middle.

The crowd was definitely exposed to the kind of music record companies have branded "alternative." Utopia, The Mighty Lemondrops, The Smiths, The Vapors, The Cult and The Violent Femmes were all groups that were represented Friday night, as well as many other alternative bands.

One noticeable problem that completely disappeared in the second half was the band's lack of stage presence. At first, the band members appeared timid, almost shy. Whatever was said between songs would be lost when one of the instruments started and drowned it out. The result was a continuous flow of music, but the band did not develop a personality until the last half of the show.

Guiot's skill on guitar was impressive. Many parts that were previously played on a keyboard were duplicated on his instrument. "New Year's Day" sounded just like the original live version off of U2's album "Under a Blood Red Sky." Obviously, no keyboard was needed there, or on the group's cover of "Just Like Heaven." Many tunes originally by Midnight Oil or The Smiths could be performed with the help of a keyboard, though.

If That Statue Moved continues to play at the high level it did on Friday, it should earn itself quite a name in Manhattan in the near future.

Australian theme sets evening apart

By Deborah Dinges
Collegian Reporter

Sights and sounds of Australia filled the Union Friday night with "Late Night Down Under."

The event was sponsored by the Union Program Council Special Events Committee and contributed to by the other Union Program Council committees and some Union departments.

"We wanted to offer an evening of entertainment at an low price," said Brent Stockwell, sophomore in education and promotion chairman.

"They did a good job of putting food and entertainment together for a cheap price," said Pam Sims, sophomore in education.

The Special Events Committee tried to plan something for everyone, especially those who don't use the Union on a regular basis, Stockwell said.

Friday Food 'n Flicks, a weekly event in the Union, started the evening with dinner and the movie "Punchline." At midnight, the movie "Risky Business" was shown, he said.

Hugh Fink, a comedian and prize-winning classical violinist, entertained a full house in the Catskeller, said Robert Mann, coordinator of entertainment and senior in hotel and restaurant management.

"He is really inventive in the way he plays off the audience's reactions," said Craig Parker, assistant professor of music.

The Melbourne Market offered games and activities with an Australian flavor, featuring mask-making and face-painting, artists making caricature drawings, computer portraits, pictionary, a graffiti board, valentine balloons and America's Cup boat racing games, Stockwell said.

An Australian television show was shown on a large screen to add to the down-under atmosphere, said Molly Clifford, senior in business management and co-coordinator.

"The Australian television show is unique and adds to the theme," Sims said.

Music and food was another feature of the evening. That Statue Moved, a local band, performed in Catskeller. The Bluemont Quartet, a local string quartet, played in the courtyard.

The Melbourne Market also featured a taste of down under with Australian style hamburgers and mineral water, he said.

Union departments were a part of the festivities by offering specials and discounts on food and bowling, Stockwell said.

In the past it has had a Mardi Gras theme, but this year Stockwell said they wanted to try something new with the Australian theme of "Say G'Day."

The committee will probably change the theme for next year because it was hard to find subjects and events that gave the Union an Australian flavor, he said.

Hayden expected to compete for re-election

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — For all practical purposes, Republican Gov. Mike Hayden is a candidate for re-election in 1990, and he has already shown voters what his formal campaign may be like.

In recent weeks, Hayden has unleashed a volley of criticism at the Legislature, blasting "big spenders" and "liberals" for trying to scuttle his plan to cut state income taxes by $79 million.

He said the Legislature was unable or unwilling to resolve important issues. His press secretary, Kathy Peterson, said the House was "in disarray."

In other words, Hayden is using an old campaign tactic for chief executives: running against the legislative branch of government.

"We're seeing a governor do what a lot of governors do," said Rep. David Miller, R-Eudora, the leader of a group of dissident House Republicans.

In the past two weeks, the Legislature has handed Hayden three political defeats on the major issues of capital punishment and tax relief.

On Feb. 1, the Senate killed a death penalty bill, 22-18. Hayden promised to push for its reinstatement when he ran in 1986.

A day earlier, the House radically altered Hayden's tax plan, passing a version that would cut income taxes $53 million, restore an income tax deduction for federal taxes paid and create a $50 million property tax relief fund. Hayden had asked the Legislature to pass his tax plan by Feb. 1, and the Senate had approved it quickly.

The House action sent the measure to a joint conference committee, where Republican senators insisted that the House take a vote on Hayden's plan.

The House voted 67-56 to send the conference committee back to work again. A group of 10 Republicans, favoring federal deductibility, and Democrats, who clamored for property tax relief, joined forces to reject Hayden's plan a second time.

"I don't think that if you ran motherhood before the House of Representatives that you'd get 63 votes for it," Peterson said.

Hayden complained that the Legislature has spent 31 days in session but hasn't sent him a single bill. However, the Legislature has rarely resolved major issues that quickly.

Peterson flatly denied Hayden has started running for re-election by attacking the Legislature. But other Republicans are more candid.

"That could very well be the tack, given some of the major issues that are unresolved," said House Majority Leader Robert H. Miller, R-Wellington. "He can't pat us on the back and thank us for being part of the team."

Hayden has not formally announced plans to run for re-election, but he has said he expects to do so. He also has formed a campaign committee and started raising money, to ward off any potential primary challengers, some legislators say.

Before the session began, Democrats and some Republicans felt Hayden was politically vulnerable, primarily because of his 1986 campaign promise to "return" an income tax windfall the state began collecting after changes in the federal tax code the same year.

Residents in relatively wealthy and heavily Republican Johnson County were said to be especially upset that Hayden did not propose more tax cuts sooner.

Hayden's tax plan was obviously designed to quiet the discontent before he runs. He unveiled it in a speech in Overland Park.

Newspaper reports Mandela beat 4 boys

By The Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — A major newspaper reported Sunday that black activist Winnie Mandela, the wife of jailed ANC leader Nelson Mandela, joined in beating some boys allegedly abducted by her unofficial bodyguards.

One of the boys, 14-year-old Stompie Seipei, is missing and feared dead.

The report deepened the controversy surrounding Mandela, who has denied wrongdoing and implied allegations against her were fabricated to hurt her husband.

The Sunday Star, a Johannesburg newspaper which opposes apartheid, said in a front-page story that Mandela whipped four boys brought to her house in Soweto last month by young men loyal to her who call themselves the Mandela United soccer team. The paper did not identify its sources.

It was the first published report asserting Mandela participated in the alleged beating.

Mandela, 54, in responding to allegations against her Friday, told CBS News, "It's not going to destroy Mandela."

"It's absurd that this particular name (Mandela) and this family can be associated with all the allegations that are being flung around," she said.

with Harry Caray.

"It was funny to listen to him give the play by play, Souza said. "(Reagan) hadn't done it since the days of radio ... he wasn't really good at getting the right guy and the right number. He'd do something like — there's the wind up ... and the pitch ... and it's a strike called on the outside corner.

"And Harry Caray would go, 'Well, Mr. President, I thought it was right on the outside corner too, but unfortunately the umpire called it a ball.'"

In getting to know the Reagans and their home life, Souza said the Reagans "are big pajama people." If nothing was scheduled, they would dress comfortably early in the evenings.

Souza took his first photography class as a junior at Boston University. After working for a year, he applied and was accepted to K-State's journalism master's program. He was a Collegian photographer for two semesters and a photo editor for two semesters and a summer.

He completed his coursework but accepted a job with The Hutchinson News before writing his thesis. He transferred to the Chanute Tribune 18 months later, but then accepted a position with the Chicago Sun-Times after a year.

After another 18 months he made his big move.

"I was in the right place at the right time," Souza said.

Carol McKay, who had worked at the Kansas City Times when Souza attended K-State, called him from Washington D.C. and offered Souza an interview for the position of White House photographer. The position opening never became public knowledge.

Now Souza has completed his job as the president's photographer and will begin freelancing when he returns to Washington.

protect against the unnecessary and uncontrolled disclosure of classified information." The information was described in the Justice Department statement as "of vital importance to the national security and the foreign relations of the United States."

Walsh issued a separate statement saying that the independent counsel filed the motion with Gesell and that the Justice Department "agreed to the motion."

Under the motion, the Justice Department compromised by narrowing its broad objections to many categories of classified material that North plans to introduce at his trial, said government sources familiar with the proposed agreement.

On Wednesday, the department sought a court order saying that North shall introduce no classified information unless the court has ruled that it is relevant and the U.S. government has no objection to its disclosure.

When that request was rejected by Gesell, the Justice Department on Thursday began seeking to delay the trial until additional safeguards were installed to ensure that North won't be permitted to introduce classified material that could harm national security.

Justice Department officials said late last week that if the delay is denied, Thornburgh is prepared to act under the Classified Information Procedures Act to file an affidavit objecting in advance to disclosure by North of some classified information. That step could result in dismissal of some or all criminal charges against North.

in the city parks, but that any advertising related to alcoholic beverages, tobacco or drugs be banned.

The recommendation was given because the ordinance was not being followed, said Nancy Bolsen, Park and Recreation Advisory Board chairwoman.

Cook said Campbell Distributors feels it is being "discriminated against."

"We are a legitimate business in this community. We contribute to a lot of other things, including MADD and SADD," he said. "We are in the process of finding out what needs to be done to make sure our side is heard. We're now working up a response."

The task force is also concerned about the signage of alcohol on the scoreboard in Bramlage Coliseum, but found out it had "no cards to play in that situation," Riley said.

The Bramlage scoreboard displays advertising for Coors, Coors Light, Pepsi and Diet Pepsi.

"The bottom line is that the organization (donating money) has made a serious financial commitment to the University and the athletic department that has helped both academic and athletic endeavors," said Chris Peterson, assistant athletic director and director of marketing and sales.

"If someone wants to donate a half-a-million dollar scoreboard, I'd be happy to put their name on the bottom."

The main concern of the task force is with the use of the advertising in the community, Riley said.

"We want the children to see ways of enjoying themselves which are fun and legal," she said. "We want to help shape the attitudes of celebration and safety when the children are forming their opinions."

Regents receive approval for funding of MOE plan

From Staff and Wire Reports

TOPEKA — The Senate budget committee Monday endorsed full funding for the second year of the Board of Regent's Margin of Excellence Plan, adding an extra $2.2 million that Gov. Mike Hayden had cut out of his budget recommendations.

The Senate Ways and Means Committee unanimously approved the $15.8 million MOE, along with $40 million in additional increases in the regent's 1990 fiscal budget.

The increases will be included in the committee's budget recommendations to be presented to the full Senate by March 1.

Charles Reagan, assistant to the president, said K-State faculty and staff have been watching the developments of MOE closely. He called the committee's action "a positive sign."

"I think there is a lot of support for Margin of Excellence," Reagan said. "I think it will receive good support in the House ... and the Senate."

Last year the Senate committee and full Senate approved full funding of the plan, but the House approved only a portion of it. A compromise was reached in conference committee that funded 83 percent of the plan.

Little discussion was exchanged about the subcommittee's report before it was approved.

The report calls for 5 percent across-the-board salary increases for university faculty. Student and classified employee salaries would increase 4 percent.

The committee also endorsed returning to the universities $4 million the state collected because of unanticipated enrollment growth. That is money the enrollment increases generated from tuition.

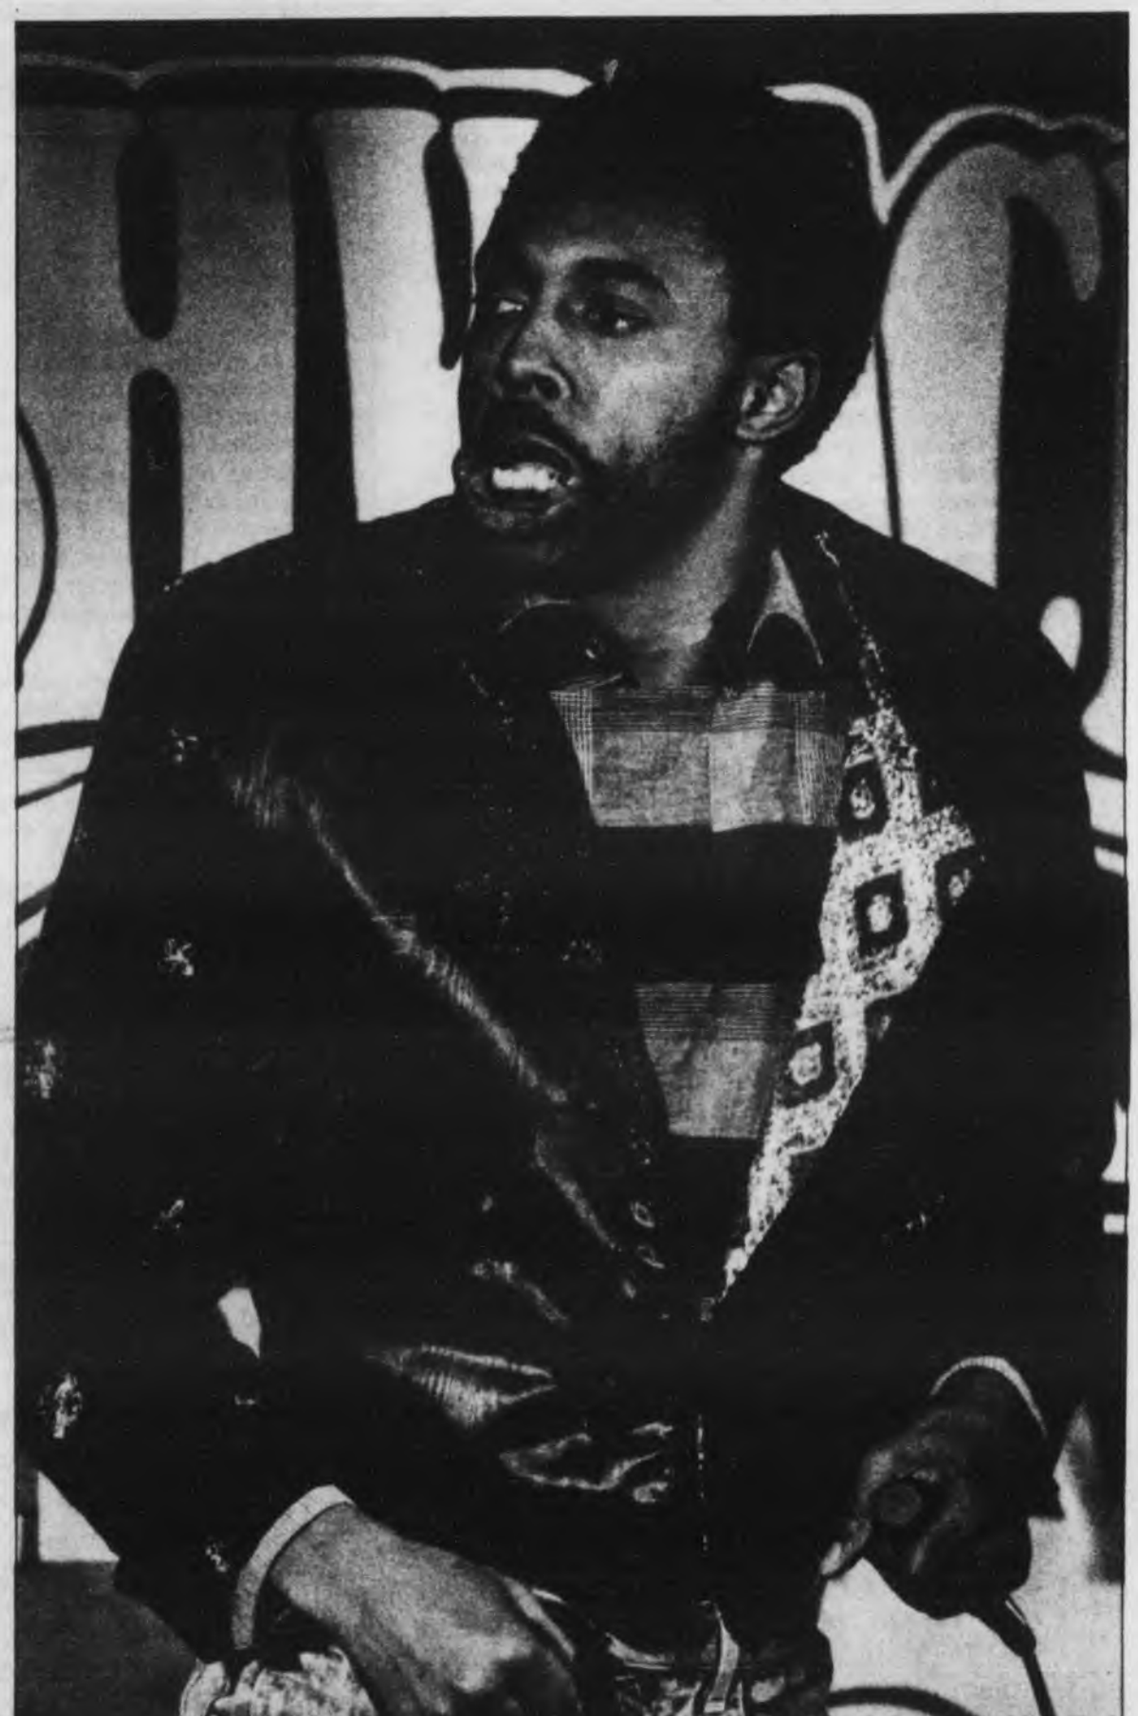
Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, said hearings will continue on aspects of MOE before a final recommendation is made to Senate. The Senate Ways and Means Committee has recommended full support for the bill, including items not listed in Gov. Hayden's budget proposal.

"I feel very good about MOE on the Senate side," Oleen said. "We couldn't be in a better position."

However, Oleen said members of the House do not necessarily reflect the support Senate Ways and Means Committee has shown to MOE in its recomendations.

"There is consternation about the bill that seems prevalent in the house," she said. "I was hopeful the bill would be supported intact."

Almost all increases in the regent's $870 million budget had been proposed by Hayden in his budget recommendations.



However, the committee decided to restore about $2.2 million to MOE — money Hayden had cut.

The governor reduced the regents' $4.5 million request for mission-related enhancements by 50 percent in his budget. These enhancements include materials such as library books and laboratory equipment.

"To me, salary enhancements are important, but if you don't have the mission-related enhancements, you can't teach," said Sen. Gus Bogina, R-Shawnee, chairman of the committee.

The committee also agreed to recommend that no new major construction projects be funded from the Regents prepare admissions bill

By Alan Wilds
Staff Writer

Open admissions at the regents schools will once again be debated in the Legislature as the Kansas Board of Regents prepares a bill to be sent to the Senate Education Committee.

Regents Executive Director Stanley Koplik said the board has recommitted itself to having the open admissions policy changed to qualified admissions with standards for admission remaining the same.

Two statutes govern regents schools admission. Martine Hammond, regents director of academic affairs, said the first allows the board to establish criteria for students' entrance into college.

The second allows any Kansas high school graduate to be eligible to enter a regents school.

"The board will be taking action to repeal the second statute," Hammond said.

The first step in legislative action required to repeal the statute is discussion in the Senate Education Committee, where the proposal will be sent in a couple of weeks, Koplik said.

"The areas of importance in the discussion will be high school preparation, motivation and the likelihood of success in college," he said.

Charles Reagan, assistant to President Jon Wefald, said all regents schools are on record as being in favor of qualified admissions.

"The goal is to stiffen high school requirements," Reagan said, "and help our students come better prepared to college."

He said he would like to see high schools return to the old standards of college preparation courses in which students had to take more English, math and science.

He said it is difficult to predict what the effects on enrollment would be, but he felt confident that students would still go to college.

"If (students) knew they had to have four years of English to go to college, I think they would do it," Reagan said.

If qualified admissions were to go into effect, it would be four years before it was implemented and there would also be exceptions, Reagan said.

"If a student was not accepted into a regents college, they could go to a community college and transfer," he said. He added that only students under the age of 21 would have to meet the requirements.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, said she answered questions concerning admissions when Associated Students of Kansas met Feb. 6 at the statehouse for Lobby Day.

Oleen said there has been no action in the Legislature.

Koplik said he really wants to move ahead with a qualified admissions policy this year, but that it is too early to predict what the outcome will be.

"Hopefully this action will be followed by a successful vote," Koplik said.

Lecturer to discuss black labor unions

By Karen Allen
Staff Writer

Nomonde Ngubo, a representative of the Confederation of South Africa Trade Unions, will discuss black labor unions in South Africa at 7:30 tonight in the Union Forum Hall.

Her speech, "Liberation in South Africa: The Role of the Black Labor Unions," is part of the 1988-89 Lou Douglas Lecture Series.

Ngubo will be in the United States for two years under the sponsorship of the United Mine Workers, said Karen McCulloh, coordinator for the series.

About 25 percent of the work force in South Africa has joined a labor union since the government first acknowledged unions as legal organizations in 1981, said Clive Fullagar, assistant professor of psychology.

Labor unions such as COSATU, which was formed in December 1985, are a "very effective way of making the working class politically conscious," he said.

COSATU has a membership of close to 600,000, Fullagar said, with the 250,000 members of the National Union of Mine Workers comprising a large part of the confederation.

Fullagar taught at a university in South Africa for 11 years before moving to Kansas last year. He said there are important distinctions between labor unions in the United States and those in South Africa.

"American unions basically protect the interests of their workers," Fullagar said. "South African unions also have that but go beyond ... they resist a state which is uniquely racist and they provide the black working class a place (to use their) political voice."

But the group has had to be "very prudent" in their dealings

Attorney opposes compromise

Lawyers: Reagan treated Contra supporters favorably

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Former President Reagan "participated personally and directly" in giving favored treatment to countries that supported the Contras in Nicaragua, lawyers for Oliver North say in a court filing aimed at having charges against their client dropped.

North attorney Brendan Sullivan, opposing a compromise between the independent counsel and the Justice Department, said in court papers released Monday that the proposed deal on keeping certain secrets out of the trial would prevent him from introducing this evidence which he said was central to North's defense.

He also criticized Attorney General Dick Thornburgh for declining "to take the political heat" and make a separate secrets-protecting move that could lead to charges being thrown out.

Sullivan said, "At the heart of this case are the quid pro quo and other third-country arrangements with which the Reagan administration obtained military support for the resistance during the so-called Boland Amendments, and the policy that those third-country arrangements would not be disclosed outside a limited group of executive branch officials."

The Boland amendments, passed by Congress, restricted and at times prohibited the spending of federal funds in support of the guerrilla war against the leftist government in Nicaragua.

Former National Security Adviser John Poindexter testified at the congressional Iran-Contra hearings in 1987 that Reagan favored making up for that lack of official U.S. support with money from other nations. But the assertion that Reagan was personally involved in arranging to return the favors is new.

Theodore Olson, an attorney for Reagan, declined comment on Sullivan's filing after its contents were described to him.

Sullivan's statements were in a written response to U.S. District Judge Gerhard A. Gesell, objecting to a new plan for protecting national security secrets at North's trial.

The plan, worked out by independent counsel Lawrence Walsh and the Justice Department, "would gut the defense and guarantee a 'cuckoo-clock' trial," Sullivan said. It would hide "critical information about the Reagan administration's third-country arrangements for military support of the resistance and the official nondisclosure of those arrangements."

Sullivan said that the way the government proposed to present this information to the jury — through a general "admission" with no details allowed — would leave out "that President Reagan and top executive branch officials participated personally and directly in those arrangements."

He said under the government proposal, the jury would never hear about "direct personal participation in the third-country arrangements" by Reagan and these officials of his administration: National Security Adviser Robert McFarlane, Poindexter's predecessor; Secretary of State George Shultz; Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger; Chairman of the Joint Chiefs John Vessey, and the late CIA Director William Casey.

Most of the details of the proposed court agreement were kept secret, but their intent was to establish nine specific categories of information that cannot be revealed by North in his defense.

The proposed agreement between Thornburgh and Walsh is a compromise to deal with Justice Department objections that rules under which the trial was to be conducted would allow North to disclose important national security information.

Gesell is to conduct a hearing on the agreement today.

The beginning of the trial was put on hold Sunday when Chief Justice William Rehnquist of the Supreme Court granted the Justice Department's request for a stay.

Borg calls reports 'ridiculous'

STOCKHOLM, Sweden — Former tennis star Bjorn Borg has again said reports he tried to commit suicide are ridiculous.

"I'm fine. I'm well off. I have made money on tennis. There is really no reason for me to think about suicide," the newspaper Expressen on Monday quoted Borg as saying in an interview at his parents' home in Monaco.

The five-time Wimbeldom champion was hospitalized in Italy last week, and his stomach was pumped. Some Italian news agencies reported the incident as a suicide attempt.

Borg, 33, said he felt sick after eating frozen fish and then, in an attempt to fall asleep despite the nausea, he took "a few" sleeping tablets.

"If you take 60 sleeping pills you don't walk out of the hospital a couple of hours later. That's ridiculous," Borg was quoted as saying.

Borg said he plans to play tennis with President Bush in May.

Lion enjoys swim after escape

NEW DELHI, India — Mithun the lion escaped from his cage at the zoo in Poona, but apparently the big cat only wanted to go for a swim.

Mithun and his mate, Minu, slipped out the door when their cage was being cleaned Sunday in the city 740 miles southwest of New Delhi, Press Trust of India said Monday.

Minu returned quickly to the cage, but Mithun headed straight for the lake, pursued by gun-wielding zookeepers, PTI said.

Mithun waded into the water and remained there for nearly an hour before zoo workers enticed him into a portable cage.

Moslems demand censoring

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — Moslem fundamentalists around the world demand that Salman Rushdie's novel "The Satanic Verses" be banned as blasphemy against Islam, and this weekend the campaign turned violent.

At least five people were killed and more than 80 injured Sunday when police fired on a mob trying to storm the U.S. Information Center in Islamabad. The protesters demanded the book be banned in the United States.

Fundamentalists say the book does not recognize Islam as the one true religion and ridicules the most precious Moslem beliefs. Pakistan and other Moslem nations banned the book after its publication last year.

Rushdie, 41, was born in India to Moslem parents and educated in Britain, where he lives. His other books include "Midnight's Children," which won Britain's prestigious Booker prize, "Shame" and "The Jaguar Smile."

Upstairs neighbor shot in leg

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn. — An off-duty police officer banged a rifle butt on his floor to make a downstairs neighbor turn down his loud music, and ended up shooting his upstairs neighbor in the leg, police said.

The incident was being investigated by police internal affairs and the major crimes squad, but so far police consider the shooting an accident, said police spokesman Vince Dean.

"There's no animosity from the people upstairs," Dean said. "They were real understanding — as understanding as someone could be."

Officer Mark Haskins, 29, told investigators he was awakened by the music about 6:30 a.m. Saturday and endured it for 45 minutes before grabbing a Frankfurt .223-caliber assault rifle from under his bed, police said.

Haskins, a firearms training assistant, said he thought the gun was unloaded when he struck the butt on the floor.

Todd D. Dingman, 29, was shot in the leg. He underwent surgery and was released from a hospital Sunday.

Noodge Nord nudges noodle

PITTSBURGH — If you remember to call Kevin Nord, you won't have to remember anything else.

Nord is a professional noodge. For a fee, he'll make sure you remember anniversaries, birthdays, hair appointments, or just about anything else you don't want to forget but don't trust yourself to remember.

Send him a card listing the date of an important event, and seven to 10 days beforehand Nord will send a reminder post card and follow it up a few days later with a telephone call. Prices are $2 for each reminder or $1.75 each for 10 or more.

If no one's home for the call, he'll try again, and again, and again.

"If worse comes to worse, I'll go out and knock on their door if I have to," he said.

Barbie doll celebrates birthday

NEW YORK — A shimmering pink carpet was rolled out in front of Lincoln Center for 1,200 guests Monday night in a 30th anniversary gala for the doyen of fashion dolls, Barbie.

Barbie's "Pink Jubilee" was one of the elaborate promotions that have become a tradition at the American International Toy Fair, where buyers from stores each year see an estimated 5,000 new toys. The 10-day trade show opened Monday.

Singer Melba Moore and television actresses Allison Smith of "Kate & Allie" and Eileen Fulton of "As the World Turns" were among the celebrities who paid tribute to Barbie during a show commemorating her success as a doll.

Man charged with murder

ARKANSAS CITY — A young man, arrested after the weekend stabbing of an 83-year-old man, was charged Monday with first-degree murder, aggravated robbery and aggravated burglary.

Timothy L. Monasmith, 18, was charged by Tim Pringle, the Cowley County prosecutor, in the death of Earl W. West. The victim, who spent 50 years as a printer and typesetter with the Arkansas City Traveler until retiring in the early 1970s, was found dead of multiple stab wounds Saturday night.

District Judge Richard Cook set bond at $150,000 for Monasmith and ordered him to appear again Thursday with his attorney.

Arkansas City Police Chief Bill Rice said West was found slumped over a chair in the living room of the home where he lived alone after police received an emergency call shortly after 8 p.m. Saturday.

The caller said there had been a murder but didn't know where. About the same time, the chief said, relatives of Monasmith, who lives about a block away, brought him to the police station and provided an address.

The complaint against Monasmith said an undisclosed amount of money was taken from the victim.

Handgun proposal withdrawn

WICHITA — A Wichita city councilman has withdrawn his proposal for a waiting period for handgun purchases.

Greg Ferris sought and received approval from the full council in November when he asked that the city staff help him study the feasibility of a waiting period. He said the idea stemmed from an October incident in which a Wichita man bought a .357 Magnum pistol one day and killed his two children and himself the next.

Ferris presided at seven meetings with gun control advocates, firearms dealers, National Rifle Association members and others to gather reaction to a possible three-day or longer waiting period.

Ferris told a news conference Monday that while a waiting period might result in cooling-off time for potential suicide victims and others buying guns, it is unenforceable. He said any purchaser could avoid the wait by driving outside the city limits.

Student killed in collision

A K-State student was killed before dawn Monday when his car collided with a snowplow in Dickinson County, the Highway Patrol said.

The victim was identified as 23-year-old Raymond McClain, junior in sociology from Wichita, the driver. A passenger in the car was injured, but details have not been released.

Investigators said the accident occurred about 4:20 a.m. near the intersection of Kansas 15 and Kansas 4. The Highway Patrol said the snowplow was traveling southbound on Kansas 15 when McClain, traveling northbound, crossed the center line in his car and the two collided head-on.

It was not determined whether the Department of Transportation truck had its blade down at the time or was salting the road following Sunday's snowfall.

The Highway Patrol's report did not indicate whether icy road conditions were a cause of the accident.

McClain's body was transported to Danner Funeral Home in Abilene. Funeral services are pending at Jackson Mortuary in Wichita where McClain's body will be moved.

Chief-of-staff sets priorities

By Lance E. Schwulst
Collegian Reporter

As the first chief-of-staff of Lafene Student Health Center, Dr. Larry Moeller said his biggest challenges are to continue quality health services and to maintain a quality staff of physicians.

"My No. 1 priority has to be to continue the quality health care the K-State community has been getting," Moeller said.

Moeller joined Lafene's staff in August 1983 and has seen rapidly increasing medical malpractice insurance rates and overall rising health care costs make financing at Lafene difficult.

"The zooming costs for malpractice insurance are a real crisis for Kansas and K-State," he said. "Our salaries are not able to keep up with the rising rates. As much as we want to stay, I don't know if we can afford to (stay).

"If we can't get legislative permission to use Lafene funds to help cover the costs, we'll probably see an exodus of physicians from K-State."

Moeller said Lafene, like every other service group, will "have to look for the dollar" in order to continue medical services.

"If we don't get a health-care increase in student fees, we'll be looking at cutting back on some more of our services," he said.

Moeller will help present Lafene's case for the fee increase at Student Senate's Thursday meeting.

"If a fee increase doesn't occur we'll have to have a team approach determining cutbacks," Moeller said. "The first place we'll probably look is after-hours care and that's too bad. With the population of K-State, we need to have full-care services."

A majority of the approximate 60,000 annual Lafene visits occur during the day, Moeller said, and most of the after-hours visits occur before midnight.

"I'd like our services to remain intact for our community of about 20,000," he said. "In order to do that we need the population to support us. We need the extra money in order to maintain (current services)."

Moeller said although he is not a "financial wizard," he will be working with the new Lafene director to try to preserve the services.

Mike Lynch, director of the Office of Academic Assistance who oversaw Moeller's selection, will also oversee the new director's selection.

Lynch said the fourth of five finalists for the position of Lafene director was interviewed Monday, and administrators hope to finalize the decision later this week after interviewing one more candidate.

"(Moeller) has a reputation for communicating well with the students as well as the staff," Lynch said. "He also has the medical expertise to oversee the delivery of medical services to the student body."

Moeller's appointment as chief-of-staff will become effective pending approval from the Affirmative Action Office. The office examines the selection procedure to ensure that equal opportunity employment practice standards have been met, Lynch said.

"I'm sure (Moeller will) do fine," said Dr. Robert Tout, retiring Lafene director.

Moeller and the new director are replacing Tout.

"Everyone is really positive about the change in structure," Moeller said. "There is going to be good deliniation and sharing of responsibilities. But, we're all still a team.

"Our medical staff has a low turnover and we are a relatively young group of professionals. That means there is continuity of care."

Waste management cost increasing by 5 percent

By Jodi Johnson
Collegian Reporter

Manhattan residents are discovering that not only is the amount of waste at the Riley County Landfill increasing, but the price of trash collection is rising along with it.

Though a solution to the landfill problem has not been found, trash collection agencies are finding that Manhattan residents are not yet "turning their nose up" to the Riley County trash stashing problem.

Refuse collection prices have steadily increased during the past few years, but the most significant rise in price occurred at the first of this year.

Collection prices increased from 20 percent to 25 percent, according to employees of B&L Trash Service, Arrow Trash Service and Refuse Control Company, three Manhattan trash collection services.

"Since the first of the year, there has been a dramatic rise in disposal prices," said Pat Schmidt, an employee of Arrow Trash. "Usually a price increase amounts anywhere from 25 cents to 75 cents. At the beginning of this year it rose $2."

Dan Harden, public works director for Riley County, said the cost of dumping waste in the landfill has increased 400 percent during the past five years — from $1 per cubic yard to $4 per cubic yard.

Some trash collection agencies have experienced loss of business due to the price increase. The loss does not occur with residential customers; it mainly occurs with commercial customers, where trash is collected from large dumpsters, said Charlie Sellens of Refuse Control. Diane Brummett of B&L Trash agreed.

"We had some commercial accounts that were lost, but we've lost hardly any of the average residential customers," Brummett said. "(The residents) almost all understand the reasons for the price increase."

Refuse Control has experienced similar problems with commercial customers. To help with the landfill problem, they separate cardboard from other waste and haul it to a local Manhattan resident.

"We have an arrangement with Roger Kvasnicka (of Resource Control Inc.) where we take him our cardboard," Sellens said. "He takes the cardboard and bails it (for recycling)."

To decrease costs, Arrow Trash has started to recycle some of the trash they collect by separating newspapers and some recyclable glass, Schmidt said.

Though the price increase has been substantial, he said, Arrow Trash residential customers have also been sympathetic to the landfill problem and have not expressed any complaints.

"(The customers) pretty much accept (the price increase). They are aware of the problem out at the landfill and realize that there is nothing else that can be done," Schmidt said.

"The price increase didn't bother me," said Scott Krebs, junior in mechanical engineering. "I really don't know what they charge at the landfill, but I'm sure (trash collectors) did what they had to do (by increasing the price)."

Some commercial haulers, Harden said, have started hauling trash to the Pottawatomie County Landfill. Officials there have just begun to charge for dumping waste.

"Until recently (officials at the landfill) have never charged at the gate for dumping waste," he said. "Parts of the Riley County refuse will go to Pottawatomie County mainly because of economic reasons."

Riley County hired Franklin and Associates of Prairie Village to make a recommendation for the best waste management strategy for the area.

Franklin and Associates is a consulting firm specializing in solid, industrial and hazardous waste disposal.

One of the preliminary reports from the firm suggested turning to the regionalization of waste disposal within a five county area including Riley, Pottawatomie, Geary, Marshall and Clay counties.

Harden said the final recommendation is due Feb. 23 and the Big Lakes Regional Council will have a public forum to study the report.

After the forum, he said the actions the county needs to take will be clarified, but it will be some time before a decision is reached.

"The problem of what to do is actually more of a political problem than an engineering problem," Harden said. "The issues will be fairly clear, it's just dealing with them that is time consuming."

Baker begins diplomatic tour

By The Associated Press

BONN, West Germany — Secretary of State James A. Baker III, on his first diplomatic tour of West European capitals, is finding it difficult to compete with the public relations blitz of Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev, a senior U.S. official said Monday.

Baker also is having his problems with West German leaders and their reluctance to support the upgrading of NATO's tactical nuclear missiles, the official said. But after touching base in six of the 15 allied capitals, Baker's biggest problem is Gorbachev and the inroads he has made in Western European public opinion.

"There is just an attraction, an intriguing quality to Gorbachev that you have to answer somehow," said the official, who participated in most of the meetings Baker has had on his trip.

"We have no answer," the official told reporters as Baker flew back to West Germany for talks with Chancellor Helmut Kohl and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher.

Responding to strong disarmament trends among the German people, Kohl last week proposed a delay of two or three years in upgrading the short-range Lance missile deployed in the country.

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization faces a decision in a few months on whether to double the range of the U.S.-built rockets from 70 miles to about 150 miles.

Kohl told reporters he wants NATO to build into its defense strategy a disarmament mandate if the allies go ahead with a plan.

After talking to the chancellor, Baker told reporters he hoped the issue could be settled at a NATO summit meeting, which is being planned for late May in Brussels.

He said Kohl gave assurances that he was not "backing off" West Germany's approval of a NATO declaration last year, saying the allied defense should mix nuclear and conventional weapons that "will continue to be kept up to date."

Covering 15 capitals in eight days is testing Baker's endurance. Monday, for instance, was a three-country day with stops in Denmark, Norway and West Germany. Today will be no easier, with Baker going to Turkey, Greece and Italy.

The conversations so far in Canada, Iceland, Britain, West Germany, Denmark and Norway have been "warm, personal and professional."

TV renaissance reaches new heights

Commentary

Mark Schmeller

Collegian Columnist

Enough of Chad Sanborn and his TV nostalgia. You probably remember reading his celebration of the 1976-77 TV season last week. I don't know about you, but I felt sorry for him. While he's busy reminiscing, a veritable boob tube renaissance is passing him by.

After all, what is "Maude" compared to "Roseanne?" Could "The Battle of the Network Stars" hold a candle to "Family Double Dare?" Would "The Merv Griffin Show" have stood a chance against "Geraldo?"

In the '70s, television was just another form of entertainment, a diversion for those times when the discos and skating rinks were too crowded.

But here in the '80s, the age of the couch potato, television is the singular centerpiece of American culture, a national beacon of banality. Television has grown into an all-encompassing, self-inclusive, self-sustaining universe.

For instance, there are an overwhelming number of TV shows about television. Game shows like "Remote Control" and "Couch Potatoes" quiz contestants about their television knowledge. Programs like "Studio 5B," "Murphy Brown" and "TV 101" are television shows about television shows.

More importantly, we have the corollary of televison about television — television about "reality."

The '80s have witnessed the rise of reality — or trash — television pioneers like Geraldo, Oprah, Phil and Mort. We have seen shows like "America's Most Wanted" and "Mysteries of Al Capone's Vaults" garner high ratings. But we ain't seen nothing yet.

The coming months promise a host of new "tabloid TV" shows in the same vein as the Fox network's "A Current Affair."

A look through Variety, the entertainment industry's trade paper, reveals that programs such as "Tabloid," "Inside Edition," "Crime Diaries," "Missing/Reward," "Cop Talk," "Crimes of the Century," "Crimewatch Tonight," "Manhunt Live," "Manhunt Update," "Crime Stoppers 800," and "Has Anybody Seen My Child" will be hitting the airwaves in major syndication soon.

But wait! There's more.

Networks will soon be raising the "based on the true story TV movie" to new heights with docudramas like "Blood Brothers: The Hillside Strangler," "The El Al Bombing," "Oliver North," "Guts and Glory: The Rise and Fall of Oliver North," "Richard Nixon: The Early Years," and "Tailspin: The Tragedy of Korean Airlines Flight 007."

But what about sex? Fear not, faithful viewers. 1989 promises such titilating titles as "Original Sin," "The Fulfillment of Mary Gray," "Throwaway Wives," "Stolen Affair," "The Penthouse" (with Robin Givens!), and last week's "Full Exposure: The Sex Tapes Scandal."

For the benefit of the curious, I should add that Morton Downey Jr.'s promising first movie, "Number One Limited," will be a theatrical release.

Nevertheless, sensationalistic movies and crime shows are old hat. What will be new and innovative in 1989?

The "stunt-oriented exploitation series," as Variety calls it, looks like the most promising new genre to hit the airwaves in years.

What is it? The "stunt-oriented exploitation" show originated in Japan a few years back with something called "Takeshi's Castle," a gameshow version of the old kid's game of king of the mountain, staged on this big polystyrene lump.

It seems America can't even come up with its own ideas for television shows anymore. Maybe Lee Iaccoca should start a network.

Nevertheless, we Americans always do things in a bigger and better way. Be sure not to miss this fall's "Rollergames," which will, according to a press release, combine "the popularity of wrestling and a touch of roller derby nostalgia."

"Rollergames" will bring roller derby "into the 21st Century by adding live rock bands, hard-body athletes, high tech graphics, form-fitting uniforms, MTV-style flash, a massive, futuristic set, and viewer participation" via 1-900 numbers.

Contestants will skate around a figure eight "roller-coaster track complete with very imaginative obstacles that defy human odds, such as a live alligator pit, a jumping ramp, the 'Hawaiian Wave,' and a 14 feet tall 'Wall of Death.'"

David Sams, the executive producer of "Rollergames," insists "this is not a contrived game." After all, the different "Rollergames" teams will be organized into leagues, which will prevent it from becoming a "freakshow."

Ditto for "Interceptor," a game show based on the 1987 Arnold Schwarzenegger flick "The Running Man." Contestants will "run an obstacle course while trying to avoid costumed professional stalkers." Unlike the film, the contestants will not be pounded, pummeled and disembowled when caught. Instead, they'll probably get some nice consolation prizes, like car wax. Thank heavens for family programming.

Would you like to be a contestant on "Interceptor?" You'll have to be a proven athlete or one of a number of "guest celeb" contestants. Just think! Mary Lou Retton, John Davidson and Dick Van Patten being tracked and hunted like wild animals. That's the way "Battle of the Network Stars" should have always been fought.

Finally, we have "American Gladiators." Need I say more? What title could be more indicative of the fall of the American empire? Doesn't this bring to mind that Orwellian nightmare of propaganda numbed yahoos packed into stadium as they yell for blood and spill beer over each other while, outside, the pagan Huns are poised to rape and pillage?

But still, doesn't the "Wall of Death" hold a certain appeal? Wouldn't you be mad if you missed seeing Kirk Cameron run and hide like a stray dog? I would.

I just can't decide if "Rollergames," "Interceptors" and "American Gladiators" are evidence of America's decline, my decline, or both. Or maybe it's just further proof television is the magic medium that enables you to watch the most irrational and offensive things without the slightest bit of remorse.

Womanizing unworthy of FBI investigation

It would seem the Federal Bureau of Investigation has added a duty to its extensive list of jobs, and it's apparently designed to stop a wave of rampant womanizing in the United States.

Gary Hart was "forced" out of the 1988 presidential campaign after photos surfaced of him and Donna Rice sailing off towards the Bahamas aboard the good ship Monkey Business. The press was attacked for prying into the private lives of candidates.

In the case of Secretary of Defense nominee John Tower, it appears the FBI is the one doing the prying.

The FBI is investigating rumors of an active sex life Tower is supposed to be enjoying. Thus far, the evidence is inconclusive about whether Tower does "it" with an array of women, but the FBI is still looking.

This brings up an interesting question: Since when is womanizing a federal crime meriting an investigation by the FBI? How much is being spent by the Justice Department to gather all of the seedy details of Tower's lovelife? Is it anyone's business with whom John Tower sleeps? And why isn't the FBI being accused of prying?

The FBI is also investigating rumors that John Tower has a severe drinking problem. While this would definitely cast severe doubt on Tower's ability to run the Defense Department, a question must once again be asked: Is this really serious enough to justify an FBI investigation?

If yes ... if heavy drinking is a federal crime, should Aggieville patrons beware?

Ironically, while FBI agents were investigating Tower's life as the ulitimate party warrior, they stumbled across what appears to be a series of deals between Tower and a number of defense contractors — at last, something the FBI is supposed to investigate. It's a sad statement the FBI came across the information by accident.

One can't help but wonder what the FBI might have discovered if so much time and energy hadn't been spent checking up on Tower's love life.

Let's just hope this doesn't become a habit for the FBI. With the increase of the illegal drug supply in the United States, the recent rash of mass murders and the growing number of missing children, womanizing seems to be a low priority "crime."

Collegian Editorial Policies

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR are always encouraged. Those which pertain to matters of campus and/or public interest are especially encouraged, and are given the highest priority.

Letters should be kept as brief as possible, preferably under 300 words. Those who cannot condense their opinions should consider submiting their letter in the form of a guest column. All letters are subject to editing for space, style and taste.

GUEST COLUMNS are also encouraged. The column should be no longer than two double-spaced, typed pages. If the submission is used as a column and not a letter to the editor, it will be accompanied by the author's photograph.

Ad unjustified

Editor,

After I saw the ad in the Collegian in praise for the Iranian revolution, I must say I have lost faith in the Americans who let this be published.

I hurt for the Americans we left in the desert 10 years ago. They didn't want to be heroes, but now they are just dead.

I come from an Italian immigrant family: devout Roman Catholic. Incidents which typify the nature of my family are many, but let me just name a few.

When Hitler sent trains to my hometown of Montemuerro, Italy, to pick up Jews to be gassed in concentration camps, my grandfather repeatedly sent the train cars back to Germany empty.

During this time, my father was with an Italian expeditionary force fighting in Russia. Once, he discovered his German superiors executing Jewish partisans in a pit. He proceeded to kill the Germans involved and set the Russian civilians free. The Office of Strategic Services eventually found out about this action and years later made my father head of the democratic party in Potenza.

While back in Italy, my father told his father and mother what had happened. My grandmother organized partisans and destroyed all the flour mills in the area so as to deny the army of bread.

The point is, that I, as a member of such a family, was expected to fight for freedom in a like manner. Ten years ago, I was a marine on my way to Iran to rescue the hostages. My family expected no less.

I lost some good friends in that desert, but I'd never thought my college newspaper would let an ad celebrating their death be published.

Don't be fooled by this ad. It insults every freedom Americans stand and fight for. Remember it well. If you ever come across it or its composers ... do not hesitate to complain.

Lack of integrity

Editor,

I was appalled when leaving the class where I was just taking a test to see some of my peers with their books open busily working through their tests. The test was not open book.

I conferred with a couple of others in the class, one who had utilized the book and another who had not. The former justified his use of the text because he only used it for one problem and, besides, others had done worse.

The latter expressed disgust similar to mine, adding that by allowing such a testing environment, the instructor put students between a rock and a hard place.

There are a few of us who work diligently to establish our integrity as students and future teachers. Yes, that is the real shocker. This class was mainly composed of students planning to be teachers. Those students who sacrificed their integrity for a raise in grade are those who will be teaching our children.

You bet I'm appalled.

Not only are these students tearing down the very educational foundation others of us are striving to build, but they plan to be role models for my children, and yours.

I hope that all who manifest these behaviors will reconsider the choices which led to their actions and their implications. Not only the self-implications, but the implications for those who go by their example.

senior in secondary education

Lobby Day thanks

Editor,

We applaud and thank the many students who spent Monday in Topeka to support K-State and higher education in Kansas. Their concern for and understanding of issues such as the Margin of Excellence, the Youth Education Services program and the Kansas Educational Savings program made them effective "lobbyists" for the future of our universities.

Our own efforts on behalf of K-State in the Kansas House of Representatives are made easier by the committed and enthusiastic support of these students.

The Kansas Legislature is faced with numerous demands for limited budget dollars. We believe, as do the students to whom we spoke, the education of Kansas youth is one of the state's best long-term investments and full funding for our regents institutions is a top priority.

Student participation in Lobby Day activities, along with continued efforts by K-State faculty and employees and the entire Manhattan community to educate the Legislature are important steps on the path to these crucial goals.

Shops profit from Valentine's Day

By Paige Gantz
Collegian Reporter

Although the trees are bare, grass is brown and the skies are gray during the middle of winter, for some individuals, today is often brightened with ... flowers, flowers, flowers.

"Valentine's Day is a special time for flowers," said Karen Medlin, owner of Westloop Floral.

Flowers can be used to express thoughts and emotions that people can't say themselves, Medlin said.

"The red rose sells more than any other type of flower or color of rose," she said. "Carnations and spring baskets filled with mixed flowers are also favorites."

For some people, holidays are the only time they buy flowers, and Valentine's Day "is the biggie," Medlin said.

The day prior to Valentine's Day may involve working during the evening or all night for flower shop employees, she said.

"We go crazy trying to get ready for the next day, which is by far the busiest," Medlin said. "We never have trouble getting extra drivers. Anyone who comes to the door and sees an individual standing with flowers is never rude."

Westloop Floral plans for the day by ordering flowers several weeks in advance, she said. Guessing the exact number of flowers to order is difficult.

Sherry McCurry, floral manager of the Dillon's Store in Westloop, keeps an inventory of the number of flowers sold.

"A month and a half after February, we order flowers for next year," McCurry said.

Dillon's hired extra people to prepare for Valentine's Day orders, she said. The store ordered 1,800 roses and had the additional employees clean and de-thorn the flowers.

The store's roses were purchased from Valley Wholesale in Wichita, which received the flowers grown in Colorado.

Dillon's charges $29.99 for a dozen arranged roses. Six boxed roses cost $18.99.

Connie Lee, owner of Aggieville Flowers, said she tries to be optimistic when she orders flowers.

"I always order more than I did (the previous year) hoping that the extra amount is never too much," Lee said. "You learn to know what sells."

She has been in the flower business for 15 years.

Lee said, "Of my four years in Aggieville, I've seen a change in the increase of who buys for whom.

"More girls are beginning to buy (flowers) for guys, even though it's the boyfriend who buys for his girlfriend or the husband who buys for his wife that are still the most common."

Lee said she purchases flowers from wholesalers in Kansas City, Topeka and Denver and the refrigerated trucks deliver flowers daily.

In addition to roses, spring flowers such as irises, tulips, and carnations are popular, she said.

"Roses take so long to grow so this is the cause for their mark up," Lee said.

A dozen long stem roses in a vase from Aggieville Flowers cost $48, she said.

Medlin said Westloop Floral charges about $50 for a dozen long stem roses.

"Flowers can be shipped in from Colombia, Holland, South America, Europe or from all over the world, and it's these shipping costs that also attribute to the high costs," Lee said.

Comedian entertains with sound effects

By Mark Schreiner
Collegian Reviewer

With enough bells and whistles to fascinate the most Nintendo-jaded video junkie, comedian/actor/singer Michael Winslow kept a sold-out crowd of more than 400 amazed and laughing Monday night at Bushwacker's Comedy Invasion.

Winslow, famous for his role in "Police Academy," performed for about 45 minutes. The members of the audience for the 8 p.m. show were hustled out to make room for the 10 p.m. show so fast, there was no hope for the encore much of them wanted.

Using sounds, situations and expression rather than word play, embarrassment and stereotypes, Winslow created a personality that was entertaining because he didn't confuse having a personality with having quirks.

In fact, the members of the crowd were less entertained by Winslow's humor than they were amazed by his ability to mimic sounds.

A la Bobby McFaren, Winslow successfully imitated, with only his voice and a microphone, the sounds of cars, dogs, cats, Rush heard through a wall, Satan, sheep, the doppler effect, sirens, Jabba the Hut, Mick Jagger, the garbage trucks behind Haymaker in the morning, "Just What I Needed" by the Cars, Michael Jackson, Peter Jennings, Ronald Reagan rapping, Jesse Jackson, thousands of people cheering and "Whole Lotta Love" by Led Zeppelin.

About the only sound Winslow didn't make was that of a record being played backwards.

He was able to mock George Bush when Bush has barely been in the public eye long enough to have mockable traits.

Winslow broke from the standard Johnny Carson comic routine of many short disconnected jokes — the format used by the two warm-up comedians, James Inman and Bud Dingman. Instead he told two long stories punctuated with his trademark sound effects.

While the audience liked Inman and Dingman, each of whom performed for 15 minutes, they loved Winslow. He showed why he was on the top of the card while they were on the bottom.

While Inman and Dingman were nervous and self-deprecating, Winslow was smiling and confident. While their jokes were better, Winslow had better delivery and milked the crowd by repeating the sounds that were liked.

Inman and Dingman rushed from joke to joke, Winslow, however, took his time and let the audience laugh without missing anything. While they put their hands in their pockets and said, "I don't know," after many jokes, Winslow's hands moved constantly, representing a car speeding past or a dog biting a man.

Inman took the stage wearing a ball cap — and Dingman a shirt with embroidered roses. However, Winslow wore a vest with sparkly moons and stars on the sleeves — looking like he took his humor as seriously as the members of the audience, each of whom paid $6 to hear it.

Dingman mocked the stereotypical Kansan and the entertainment available in Garden City. Winslow had done his homework and knew that Moro was Manhattan's main drag and incorporated this into his routine.

While Inman made the default jokes about Gremlins and 7-11 burritos, Winslow showed the silliness of such cool things as Robert Plant and Porsches.

Winslow's originality and his unique sounds opened other avenues for him. Unlike Inman and Dingman, he didn't have to rely on cheap sex, urine and cussing jokes — which are funny enough, but can be found on any wooden desk more than five years old. After one joke he said, "I didn't say anything dirty."

Winslow, who is black, also steered clear of ethnic jokes, avoiding the Eddie Murphy mentality that ethnic jokes are fine as long as the comedian is a member of the group of which he's making fun.

Winslow didn't hesitate to breathe into the microphone, to use the proximity effect or to put the microphone deep into his mouth.

Dingman also used sound effects, imitating a 30-year-old record of a blues singer with tuberculosis in a finale much like McFaren's "Manana Iguana." But Dingman's best sound was an average one for Winslow. His routine was one long excuse for sound effects — and a good excuse at that.

Letterman invites small town to show

By The Associated Press

BOLAN, Iowa — March 1 will be a late night for this town.

Its residents — all 16 of them — will appear that evening as guests on the NBC-TV show "Late Night With David Letterman."

"If he's looking for American Gothic, I think he's going to be disappointed," said Daryl McCready, Bolan resident. "We don't exactly have hats and pitchforks. We know what's going on in the world."

None of the residents of this northern Iowa town, which isn't even on some state maps, has ever been to New York. But most are at least vaguely familiar with the talk show host famous for his "Stupid Pet Tricks" routine and off-beat humor.

"His show is on too late for us, although we did all get together and watch his seventh anniversary special," said 73-year-old Ruth Hansen. "It was kind of interesting."

Loren Nydegger, a senior basketball player who attends high school at nearby St. Ansgar, said, "A lot of people are pretty excited about this.

"They joke about things like when they introduce the team at games, they'll say, 'And now, going to New York and being on the David Letterman show and also playing guard, Loren Nydegger,'" he said.

Jodi Ross, a talent researcher for the show, suggested Bolan after talent coordinator Madeleine Smithberg came up with the idea of inviting an entire town to be guests on the program.

"The thing is that there's a lot of little towns across the country and Bolan is just — from everything I've read about the town and everything I hear about it — they're just really a special little community," Ross said.

Rape defendants file civil suits

Lawyers volunteer time to protect victims

By The Associated Press

BOULDER, Colo. — Boulder District Attorney Alex Hunter says there has been no lack of volunteers since he asked attorneys to donate their time to defend rape victims sued by the men who allegedly attacked them.

"We have already had two cases in the last several months in which the suspects have instituted civil suits against the victim," he said. "I can't remember another situation like this involving rape victims in the 16 years I have been district attorney."

Local rape crisis officials say the lawsuits against victims will deter even more women from reporting sex crimes. Such lawsuits, which also have been filed elsewhere, usually stem from rape cases in which the people involved were either dating or acquainted, officials say.

In one of the two Boulder cases, University of Colorado football player George Massucco filed a slander suit against a CU student after he was charged with first-degree sexual assault.

His attorney, Patrick Butler, said his client only kissed the woman. He said Massucco "is not going to sit idly by and let this happen." Massucco alleges the woman made "wrongful, careless and negligent allegations" that humiliated him.

In the other case, a woman filed a lawsuit against her alleged attacker after prosecutors refused to file criminal charges. The man filed a countersuit after the woman refused to sign a statement absolving him of guilt.

Dan Caplis, an attorney for that 18-year-old man, said his client didn't want to sue, but felt he had no other way to clear his name. The man accuses the woman of abuse of process, malicious prosecution and outrageous conduct.

"You have to take these cases individually," Caplis said. "My client is not guilty. I understand the concern of the rape crisis personnel and I share that. I might even volunteer to help on some of the cases myself. But you have to consider it case by case."

Laura Sharpe, a counselor for the Rape Crisis Center in Boulder, said there is a concern that a legal precedent might be set if one of the women loses her case.

Attorneys willing to volunteer their time to defend such cases will help persuade women to come forward, Sharpe said.

"I think the fact that attorneys are volunteering their time sends a message that they believe in the victim. There is always the possibility they could lose the case, but having someone standing by your side is a powerful statement," she said.

Nancy Biele, president of the National Coalition Against Sexual Assaults in Minneapolis, said of the trend to lawsuits that many prosecutors are unwilling to take on date rape cases unless they have a good chance of winning.

"Some are poor cases and need to be turned down, some of them are so awful it would be unethical to file charges, but others could be prosecuted and they simply won't take them, because they're not sure of winning," Biele said.

Michael Enwall, a former Boulder District Court judge, has offered his help to defend women, but said civil court is not the place to fight such battles. He said defendants in rape cases who believe they have been wrongly accused should seek redress in criminal court, where perjury charges could be filed.

But he said that because of the different evidence requirements in civil and criminal courts, the wrongly accused have a better chance of winning in civil court. In criminal courts, prosecutors must prove a defendant's guilt beyond a shadow of a doubt — sometimes difficult to do in rape cases, especially those involving date rape. In civil courts, the only requirement is a "preponderance of evidence."

Soviet pullout nearly complete

By The Associated Press

KABUL, Afghanistan — The Red Army said farewell to Kabul in a ceremony at the frigid airport Monday, then paratroopers in fur hats and padded uniforms decorated with Afghan medals climbed into a jet transport and were flown away.

Some Soviet soldiers remained, but officials said they would be gone by Wednesday, the deadline for the Kremlin to have all its forces out of a civil war it entered more than nine years ago.

A U.N. airlift has been suspended because a cargo plane loaded with food and medicine left Islamabad in neighboring Pakistan without clearance and another airline pulled out of the program, U.N. officials said.

A Swedish airline said it was sending a plane to Islamabad and would carry the emergency cargo if there was no risk to the aircraft or crew, Sweden's national airline TT reported.

In Islamabad, Afghan guerrillas briefly resumed a Moslem council Monday that was called originally to choose an interim government, but two important leaders did not attend and spokesmen said factional quarrels about power sharing continued.

The guerrillas, who began fighting after a communist coup in April 1978, predict the Marxist government in Kabul will fall soon after the Red Army completes its withdrawal under a U.N.-mediated agreement.

Soviet soldiers entered the country in December 1979 and totaled an estimated 115,000 when the withdrawal began May 15.

At an airport ceremony Monday to which 150 foreign journalists were invited, Lt. Col. Pytor Sardarchuk praised 15 young paratroopers who stood in front of their Antonov-12 transport plane.

"We have helped Afghanistan create order and provided economic supplies and other goods," he said. "Now you are leaving Afghan soil and I want to say thank you very much for your service and to wish you all the best, happiness and health and a safe return home."

Capt. Alexander Zhadan said: "The medals on our chest — Afghan medals — bear witness to what we have accomplished. We would like to hope that there will be peace in Afghanistan and that the people of Afghanistan will remember us fondly."

At least one departing soldier, a 20-year-old, questioned the accomplishments.

"I think it could have been done peacefully," he said in answer to a question as he boarded the plane, which took off for Tashkent. He said he thought Soviet intervention "was all a big mistake."

Paratroopers waved through the windows as the plane taxied down the runway and took off. It climbed in a tight spiral because of the surrounding mountains and spouted flares to deflect any heat-seeking missiles that guerrillas in the mountains might fire.

About 450 Soviet soldiers quietly left the besieged capital Sunday during a snowstorm.

Sardarchuk would not say how many soldiers remained in Kabul after Monday's ceremony, which had been billed as the departure of the last Red Army troopers. They could be seen in armored personnel carriers posted around the airport's military section and along its perimeter.

Faculty to vote on finals schedule

By The Collegian Staff

Faculty Senate will vote today on proposed changes in the finals examination schedule and general faculty grievance procedures.

The meeting will begin at 3:30 p.m. in the Union Big Eight Room.

The proposed change in the final examination schedule and general faculty grievance procedures will be the focus of the meeting, said Cornelia Flora, president.

Wayne Nafziger, Academic Affairs Committee chairman, said a "mock (final exam) schedule," which extends finals week by two days, was approved last semester.

"The schedule was set up to extend finals week from five to seven days," Nafziger said. "This would allow more study time for the student between each exam.

"The basic structure would be exams on Thursday and Friday with the weekend set up as study days. The exams would then continue Monday through Friday, as is now the procedure."

If passed, the proposed schedule would begin fall 1990.

The committee also proposed an extended schedule for spring 1991, he said.

"The proposed schedule cannot become effective earlier because of procedural rules that must be observed, including publication of the schedule changes," Nafziger said.

He said faculty members are concerned with the decrease in number of class days.

Flora said two instruction days may possibly be added to the schedule if finals week is extended.

"One possibility is to add two class days and keep the proposed seven-day exam schedule," she said.

The Birthplace

The birth of a child is a very special experience in any man's life, and we understand that you want your new baby to receive excellent care.

The Birthplace at Memorial Hospital has this area's only Level II Neonatal Intensive Care Unit. In fact, it's where other area hospitals transfer their babies when medical complications arise.

Not all babies need the special care of our Intensive Care Nursery, but those who do are constantly observed, monitored, and treated by a team of very experienced doctors, specially trained nurses, respiratory and physical therapists, clinical dietitians, medical technologists, and clinical pharmacists.

The Birthplace also offers unlimited visiting privileges to Fathers and Grandparents. We want you to have every opportunity to share the joy of a new life. After all, he's got your eyes!

We want you to see our beautifully redecorated Birthplace. Please call the Director of Education at 776-3300, ext. 113 and she will schedule your personal tour.

Intensity key for Miller

By Mike Rouse
Collegian Reporter

Intensity.

That's the one word that describes the way K-State's Diana Miller plays basketball every time she steps onto the court.

"That is where I play my best — when I'm intense," Miller said. "If I'm not, I tend to slack off and not play real well. I have always played intensely since I have been in athletics."

Miller graduated from Buhler High School in 1987 after leading her team to the 5A state basketball title with a 24-1 record. So an 8-20 K-State record her freshmen year was a new experience for her.

"Really, I didn't know what to think because I wasn't used to losing and it was really tough adjusting to it," Miller said. "But I still felt that we could win, we just didn't have the chemistry we do this year."

But this season has meant a complete turnaround for Miller and her teammates. The Lady Cats are 16-7 overall and 6-4 in Big Eight play. Miller said the difference this year has been the team play of the Lady Cats.

"Off the court we are the same, but on the court we are a lot different because we play team ball and we just know what each other is able to do," she said.

Miller said her contributions in the areas of rebounding and defense are more important to the team than coming out and scoring 20 points every game. This season, she is averaging 12.5 points and seven rebounds a game.

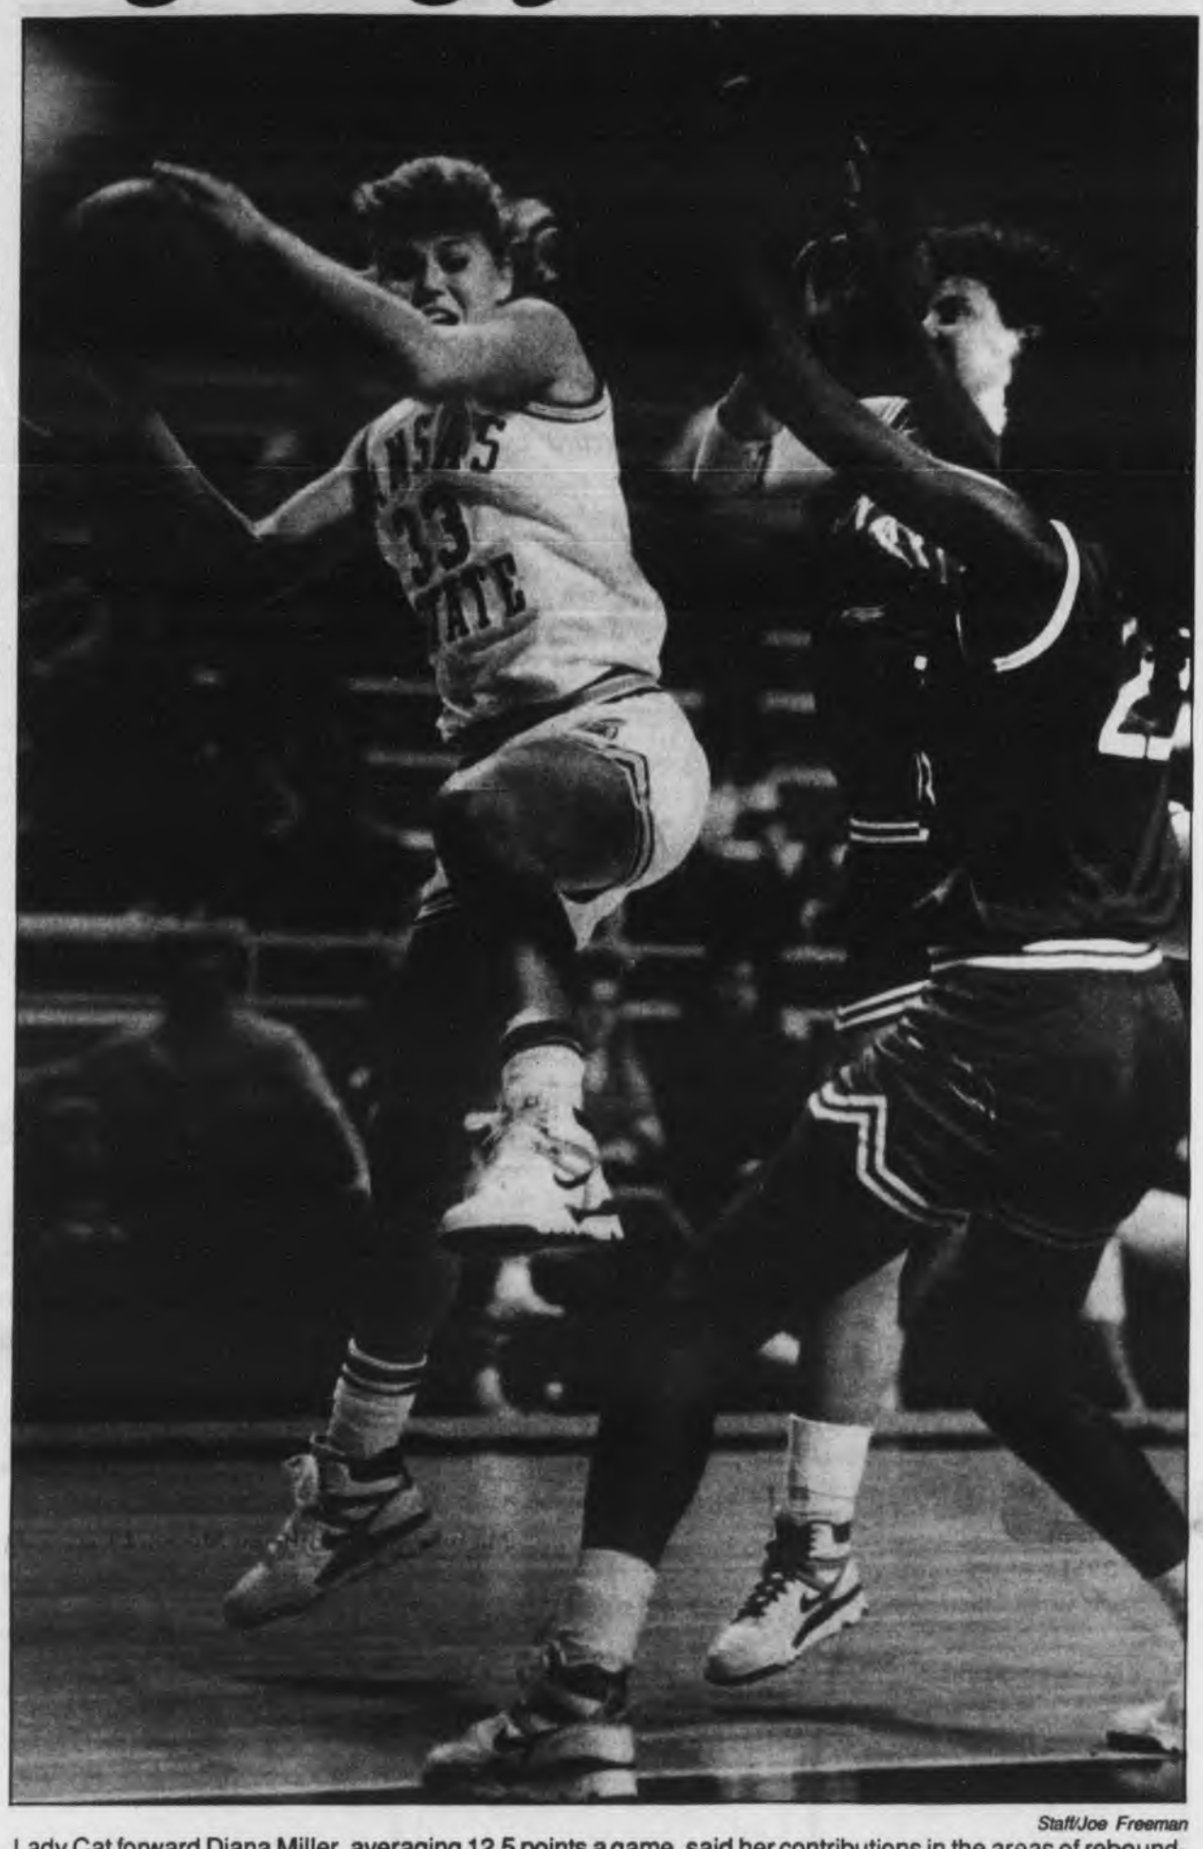
"I'm leading the team in rebounding and someone has to pick up the slack rebounding and defensively," Miller said. "I think if I wanted to, I could score 20 points every game, but I look to play more team ball.

"Last year I averaged seven rebounds a game and that surprised me because I am not good at blocking out. I have worked on that, but I wanted to average eight rebounds a game this year, which I am one short of," she said.

After going 8-20 last year, the Big Eight coaches had the Lady Cats ranked last in the pre-season poll. Miller said the team knew it was better than that and have been proving it.

"We wanted to go undefeated at home, but we can't do that because of the loss to Colorado. We wanted to place anywhere between first and third in the Big Eight," she said.

The Lady Cats are second in the conference and will travel to Colorado Wednesday to play the league-leading Lady Buffs. But one goal the Lady Cats had set still hasn't been reached.



"We want to win the Big Eight post-season tournament and go to the NCAA tournament," Miller said.

The team hasn't yet played its best this year, she said. Another problem for the Lady Cats last year was that they didn't reach the peak of their playing at the right time.

"Coach Mossman says we keep getting closer (to peaking) and last year I think we peaked too early," Miller said. "This year we still have a lot of talent and have been building on that, but we have peaks every now and then."

K-State has lost its last two conference matches, both being road games at Iowa State and Nebraska.

"We are still playing good and we can still improve, but we are just down right now and aren't playing the team ball we are capable of," she said.

Lady Cat forward Diana Miller, averaging 12.5 points a game, said her contributions in the areas of rebounding and defense are more important to the team than scoring 20 points every game.

'Cats' Humphrey player of week

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

After averaging 21.5 points, 6.5 assists, 4.5 steals and 4.5 rebounds in two games last week, K-State guard LaKeith Humphrey was named the Big Eight Conference's player of the week Monday.

Humphrey scored 18 points, dished out five assists and grabbed six rebounds in the Wildcats' 104-89 rout of Iowa State Thursday. He then turned around and poured in a career-high 25 points, dealt seven assists and had seven steals in K-State's 80-66 victory against Nebraska Saturday.

"It's a nice honor for 'Keith (Humphrey). He worked hard last week," K-State coach Lon Kruger said.

Had Humphrey not been named for the honor, it probably would have gone to his backcourt mate Steve Henson. In the same two games last week, Henson averaged 22 points and 7.5 assists. He had 19 points and nine assists against Iowa State and then matched Humphrey's 25 points against Nebraska.

"I thought 'Keith (Humphrey) and Steve both had outstanding games last week," Kruger said. "They've both been playing very well, especially in Big Eight play.

"They have been very consistent, are playing well together right now, have been able to make shots for other people and we just feel comfortable to have the ball in their hands."

Humphrey has been hot since the Big Eight schedule started. He has been in double figures in 12 of the Wildcats last 13 games. On defense, he has been impressive limiting Oklahoma all-American candidate Mookie Blaylock to just 11 points, 13 below his average, in the 'Cats 90-82 loss to the Sooners. He also shut down Lee Coward of Missouri's celebrated guard trio.

"Other teams, they look to stop Steve and Coach wants me to step up and be able to complement him when they shut him down. I kinda like doing that and it works out pretty well," Humphrey said after the team's win against Nebraska.

Tubbs hoping No. 1 not to be short-lived

By The Associated Press

NORMAN, Okla. — Oklahoma Coach Billy Tubbs is happy to be No. 1 in the nation — again.

"We'd like to stay there," Tubbs said Monday after learning his Sooners had taken over the top spot in The Associated Press college basketball poll again. "But we're not going to get into the hype of the thing. We've experienced it before, so now maybe we can do better."

Oklahoma was ranked No. 1 two weeks ago for the first time in the school's history. But the Sooners lost to intrastate rival Oklahoma State and fell to fifth in last week's poll.

Oklahoma moved back to No. 1 this week after defeating No. 3 Missouri and Arizona, last week's No. 1 team.

Tubbs noted after Sunday's 82-80 victory over Arizona that the No. 1 team has had to immediately go out and play tough road games. The Sooners are no different.

"This week we've got Kansas and Colorado on the road," Tubbs said. "I think there should be some kind of clause that if you get to be No. 1, you can change your schedule so you don't have to play on the road for at least two weeks," he joked.

Oklahoma, 21-3, received 58 first-place votes and 1,273 points from the nationwide panel of sportswriters and broadcasters to top Arizona, 18-3, which dropped to second with two first-place votes and 1,162 points.

Missouri, 21-4, remained third despite its loss to Oklahoma, receiving two first-place votes and 1,096 points. Georgetown, 18-3, dropped from second to fourth after a 79-74 loss to Pittsburgh with 1,001 points, 13 more than Illinois, 20-3.

The Fighting Illini, who were seventh last week, had 988 points to edge Syracuse, 21-4, which received 974 points. The Orangemen, Fighting Illini and Oklahoma were the only members of last week's Top Ten not to lose in a week that saw 12 members of the Top Twenty lose a total of 14 games.

Florida State, 19-2, moved to seventh with one first-place vote and 813 points. North Carolina, Indiana and Louisville rounded out the Top Ten.

The Tar Heels, 19-5, received 791 points in dropping one spot, while Indiana, 20-5, rose from 13th to ninth.

Louisville, which lost two of three games last week to fall to 17-5, dropped from fourth to 10th with 731 points.

Duke, 17-4, led the Second Ten with 641 points that included the final first-place vote. The Blue Devils were followed by Seton Hall, Michigan, West Virginia, Iowa, Ohio State, Stanford, Nevada-Las Vegas, North Carolina State and Louisiana State.

The Top Twenty teams in the Associated Press' college basketball poll, with first-place votes in parentheses, total points based on 20-19-18-17-16-15-14-13-12-11-10-9-8-7-6-5-4-3-2-1, record through Feb. 12 and last week's ranking:

Area golfer, bowler recognized by magazine

By Tom Morris
Sports Writer

JUNCTION CITY — Something unique happened in this area when the most recent issue of Sports Illustrated hit mailboxes and newsstands.

No, we're not talking about the infamous swimsuit issue, either.

Tim Gromlovits, manager of an auto salvage yard here, was featured in the Feb. 13 issue of SI. His picture appears on page 90 of the national publication under the weekly installment of "Faces in the Crowd."

Gromlovits was featured because he had shot a hole in one on the fourth hole of Rolling Meadows golf course in Junction City and a month later rolled his third 300 bowling game of the year at Wildcat Lanes in Manhattan.

Since his picture has appeared in a publication that is read weekly by almost 19 million readers, Gromlovits has naturally been the focus of some attention.

"It's really been pretty nice," Gromlovits said. "A few people have called me. My sister-in-law in South Carolina called me after her son noticed there was a Gromlovits in 'Faces in the Crowd.' He was so excited, he didn't even recognize it was me at first."

Gromlovits, who has a 212 bowling average and is a six handicapper in golf, said the perfect games in bowling were more exciting.

"In golf, I think it was more luck than anything," he said. "There's more pressure at the bowling alley because everything gets quiet and everyone stops to watch you when you're getting close to a perfect game."

Gromlovits has had three 300 games sanctioned by the American Bowling Congress and threw another perfect game while practicing for the Junction City tournament at Custer Hill Lanes at Fort Riley.

Gromlovits, 34, who lettered in soccer, baseball and basketball at Ellington (Conn.) High School, is now a resident of Junction City via the U.S. Armed Forces. Any aspirations of college or professional sports were cut short because of the impending draft.

"It was either get drafted or join. I went ahead and signed up," he said.

He was eventually stationed at Fort Riley and met his wife, who, at the time, lived in Junction City. Gromlovits bowls three nights a week and practices twice on the weekends. He used to play other team sports such as basketball or softball, but his career has altered his sporting lifestyle.

"I've had to concentrate on the more individual sports to accomodate my work schedule," he said.

Gromlovits was nominated to Sports Illustrated by Bruce Beggs, sports editor of the Junction City Daily Union.

Hearty Valentine's wish goes out to second-place Lady Cats

Bleeding Purple

BRIAN HUMMELL
Sports Columnist

If the chocolates in heart-shaped boxes piled outside your door and your significant other's red underwear didn't clue you in, let me. It's Valentine's Day.

I didn't have enough time, inspiration or will power to send out cards, so this will have to suffice.

Because I'll never be on television at a sporting event, first greetings go to my Mother. Hi, Mom. What's up? We're No. 1.

Second, happy V-Day to those hundreds, make that thousands, of campus coeds who turn to the sports page every other Tuesday to salivate over my dorky picture.

And lastly, a big red heart with a purple border to those K-State hoopsters. Whoa, wait a minute guys, don't get the wrong idea. Remember my second greeting?

This last one goes out to the Lady Cats.

Would you be mine?

Could you be mine?

I wouldn't blame you if you said no. I've ignored you for the past four years, and now all of a sudden I'm smitten, oh heck go ahead and call it a crush. For two weeks now my every thought and dream has somehow incorporated the Lady Cats.

Unfortunately during that span, four of the five Lady Cats' games have been out of town. And the one game that was here on a Saturday night, well I was busy ... studying.

So, the next game for my dream team is Wednesday. Although it's the day after Valentine's Day, I'm going to put on my red boxers — you know, the ones with cupid shooting arrows on them — and my extremely bright red socks and fly to Colorado to watch them play.

OK, I'm not, but I'd like to. I like wearing those boxers, but I can wait.

The Lady Buffs, scary thought, are first in the Big Eight Conference standings and nationally ranked. The Lady Cats are tied for second and have an outside chance of going to the national tournament. A big win Wednesday would sure help.

Another thing which might help would be a big crowd for the Lady Cats' next home game. This happens to be Saturday night when, unfortunately, a lot of students are busy ... studying.

Also unfortunately a large crowd, relatively speaking, for a Lady Cats' game is tiny compared with the seating capacity of Bramlage Coliseum or Ahearn Field House ... or Manhattan High's gym, for that matter.

Fortunately, the opponent is the University of Kansas and certainly another exciting K-State-KU clash is worth putting back study time a couple hours.

Also for those students with small wallets, there is no admission charge Saturday — that is, unless you forget your student ID. This in turn may leave some cushioning for your backside which in turn may be needed because most Lady Cat fans don't stand for the entire game. At least that's the rumor going around.

Chances are there will not be any slams or jams or monster dunks, but the games can still be exciting.

If you don't have a Valentine and you're feeling kind of low, save those red underwear for Saturday's game.

Imagine the inspiration 4,000 fans clad in red skivvies can provide.

Ebony Theatre unique to area

Troupe members prepare for scholarship contest

By Steve Logback
Collegian Reporter

Ebony Theater is the only theater troupe of its type in the Midwest, said Anne Butler, director for educational supportive services.

"What I like about (Ebony) is that it has been a vehicle for students of different races to come together and interact around a medium that they both enjoy," Butler said.

Members of the troupe are rehearsing for the American College Theater Festival regional competition in Lawrence from Feb. 21 to Feb. 26.

At least three members of the local troupe will be auditioning for the Irene Ryan Foundation Scholarship at the festival.

The late Irene Ryan could be best known for her role as Granny in the syndicated television series "Beverly Hillbillies."

Contestants for the scholarship will perform a five-minute monologue and an additional piece with a scene partner, which will be judged for the award.

Butler said only one student from those auditioning at the festival will receive the $1,000 scholarship.

The winner at the regional level is entitled to advance to a competition in Washington, D.C., for a chance at the national scholarship worth $2,500.

"(The idea for the troupe) started in 1977 when two students in Dr. Norman J. Fedder's play writing class talked to him about their interest in doing black plays," Butler said. "(Fedder) basically helped the group get started."

During the years, the number of members in the group has fluctuated.

"We had a little more than 30 students this past year, but it varies from semester to semester," he said.

The troupe has 27 members.

Butler said, no special criteria are required for students to be eligible for the troupe.

"Ebony is open to any student who is interested in the theater and literary experiences of African Americans — that is basically what we focus our work on," she said. "Auditions are held and students are selected based on results of the auditions."

The primary intent of the troupe is to provide opportunities for students who are non-theater majors, Butler said, but who have talent and love to perform.

"Some students, during the years, have decided to go on and major in theater as a result of their interest in performing," she said. "This allows them to come together one or two times a year and satisfy that urge for performing."

Besides performances, the troupe also involves itself with other activities such as poetry readings and University Open House in the spring.

Family conflict depicted in group's contest entry

By Steve Logback
Collegian Reporter

Ebony Theatre, K-State's 11-year-old, predominantly black theater troupe, will perform "Wait Til Morning" at 8 p.m. Wednesday in Nichols Hall.

The performance precedes an appearance by members of Ebony Theatre at the American College Theater Festival regional competition Feb. 21 through Feb. 26 in Lawrence. "Wait Til Morning" is the first K-State production to be selected for regional competition in 15 years.

Harold Nichols, head of the Department of Speech, said Ebony Theatre is the only group from K-State chosen to compete at the regional competition and is also the only active black student theater group that will be performing at the festival.

"Wait Til Morning" was written by Stacy Smith, who received a master's degree in English from K-State. The play depicts a conflict between a mother and her daughter during the late 1950s because of the daughter's wish to take an active role in the civil rights movement. Lisa Rothelle and Trenetta Tubwell portray the characters.

Judges from several regional universities chose "Wait Til Morning" from among about 72 entries from university productions throughout Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri and Iowa, said Ebony Theatre adviser Anne Butler. She received notice of the group's selection Dec. 16.

"(Judges) came and viewed the show, talked with the cast, viewed other productions, and got together as a panel and made their selections," Butler said. "Certainly, the quality of the acting, the technical directing and the staging of the play was a big part of the selection."

During the competition, the play will be judged to determine if it will advance to national competition in April at the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in New York.

"Certainly, the quality of the acting, the technical directing and the staging of the play was a big part of the selection."
— Anne Butler, Ebony Theatre adviser

"A panel of judges from the national level will view the production," Butler said. "If it were to meet the criteria they use for judging, then it could possibly be selected to appear at the national American College Theater Festival."

Tickets for Wednesday's production are $5. Selected scenes from another production, "Colored Museum," will also be performed Wednesday. Proceeds will be used to offset the troupe's expenses at the regional competition.

with the South African government because they know that "getting into politics to any substantial degree could cut into (their) power," said Wayne Nafziger, professor of economics.

Fullagar agreed.

"Union members generally are sympathetic to the African National Congress but it's very difficult to come out in favor of them because that's what the government is looking for (as a reason to ban the organization)," he said.

Ngubo will also attend a teach-in at noon in the Union Courtyard, McCulloh said. "What is Your University Funding in South Africa?" is the topic of the teach-in and is sponsored by the Black Student Union, Students for Educational Awareness and Uhuru.

"A lot of people have been curious about whether divestment is a good idea ... we're hoping to address some of the questions at the teach-in," said Paige Nichols, a member of SEA.

Those people interested in visiting with Ngubo can join her for lunch in Union 202 after the teach-in, or at a reception sponsored by the Africa Student Union and the Committee for Economic Awareness immediately following the lecture in Forum Hall, McCulloh said.

Educational Building Fund.

Committee members endorsed the building moratorium after regents officials said they needed more than $140 million to bring all existing facilities up to satisfactory condition.

"Our discussion in subcommittee centered on the fact that everyone wants new buildings," said Sen. Jim Allen, R-Ottawa.

Lecturer: Unions need assistance to end apartheid

By Karen Allen
Staff Writer

Although workers in South Africa are imposing "people sanctions" in their movement to end apartheid, they cannot fight the racist government alone, said Lou Douglas lecturer Nomonde Ngubo.

Ngubo, U.S. representative of the Confederation of South African Trade Unions, told a Forum Hall audience of about 200 Tuesday that the United States should "make real the promise of democracy of a kindler, gentler nation by calling for complete economic sanctions."

At a press conference Tuesday morning, Ngubo said imposing economic sanctions is not just her wish, but the request of the workers.

At the confederation's annual conference last year, the workers drafted a proposal calling for people "to impose full, comprehensive and mandatory sanctions."

"The line between economics and politics is a very thin one."
— Nomonde Ngubo COSATU representative

More than a million workers are members of COSATU, which Ngubo said has become the "most unified force for people to express their political views."

"The line between economics and politics is a very thin one," she said.

The National Union of Mine Workers, with 360,000 members, constitutes the largest portion of COSATU.

One prominent display of people sanctions occurred in June, 1988, when 250,000 mine workers went on a three- or four-day strike, Ngubo said. Fourty-four mines were involved in what she called the "longest and costliest" strike ever.

Political campaigns conducted by labor unions in America have helped free COSATU members detained by the South African government, she said. Recently, the head of the metal workers union in South Africa was released after immense pressure from a U.S. lobbying group led by the United Auto Workers.

But the U.S. government has a history of taking sides with the South African government. Ngubo said whenever a vote concerning imposition of econonomic sanctions on South Africa has been taken at the United Nations Security Council, the United States has voted against it.

The 138 U.S. companies with investments in South Africa employ 0.4 percent of the work force. Ngubo said companies such as Shell Oil Co. "claim they are there to help," but in actuality are supplying much-needed oil to the government and military.

"Oil deposits are our vulnerable point ... our Achilles heel," she said.

South Africa's problems of racial discrimination stem back to 1652, Ngubo said, when a Dutch explorer told the natives they were pagans and needed to read the Bible, close their eyes and pray.

"When we opened our eyes, we had the Bible and he had the land," she said. "We'll keep the Bible, but we want the land back."

To date, 83 percent of South African land belongs to 15 percent of population, all of whom are white, Ngubo said. The remaining 17 percent of the land is divided among the blacks and Indians, who comprise 85 percent of the population.

Ngubo said she became involved in trade unions in 1981 after being politically active at a university in South Africa. She answered an advertisement for a trade union organizer in Johannesburg, where her future employers told her, "We need someone strong ... we need a man."

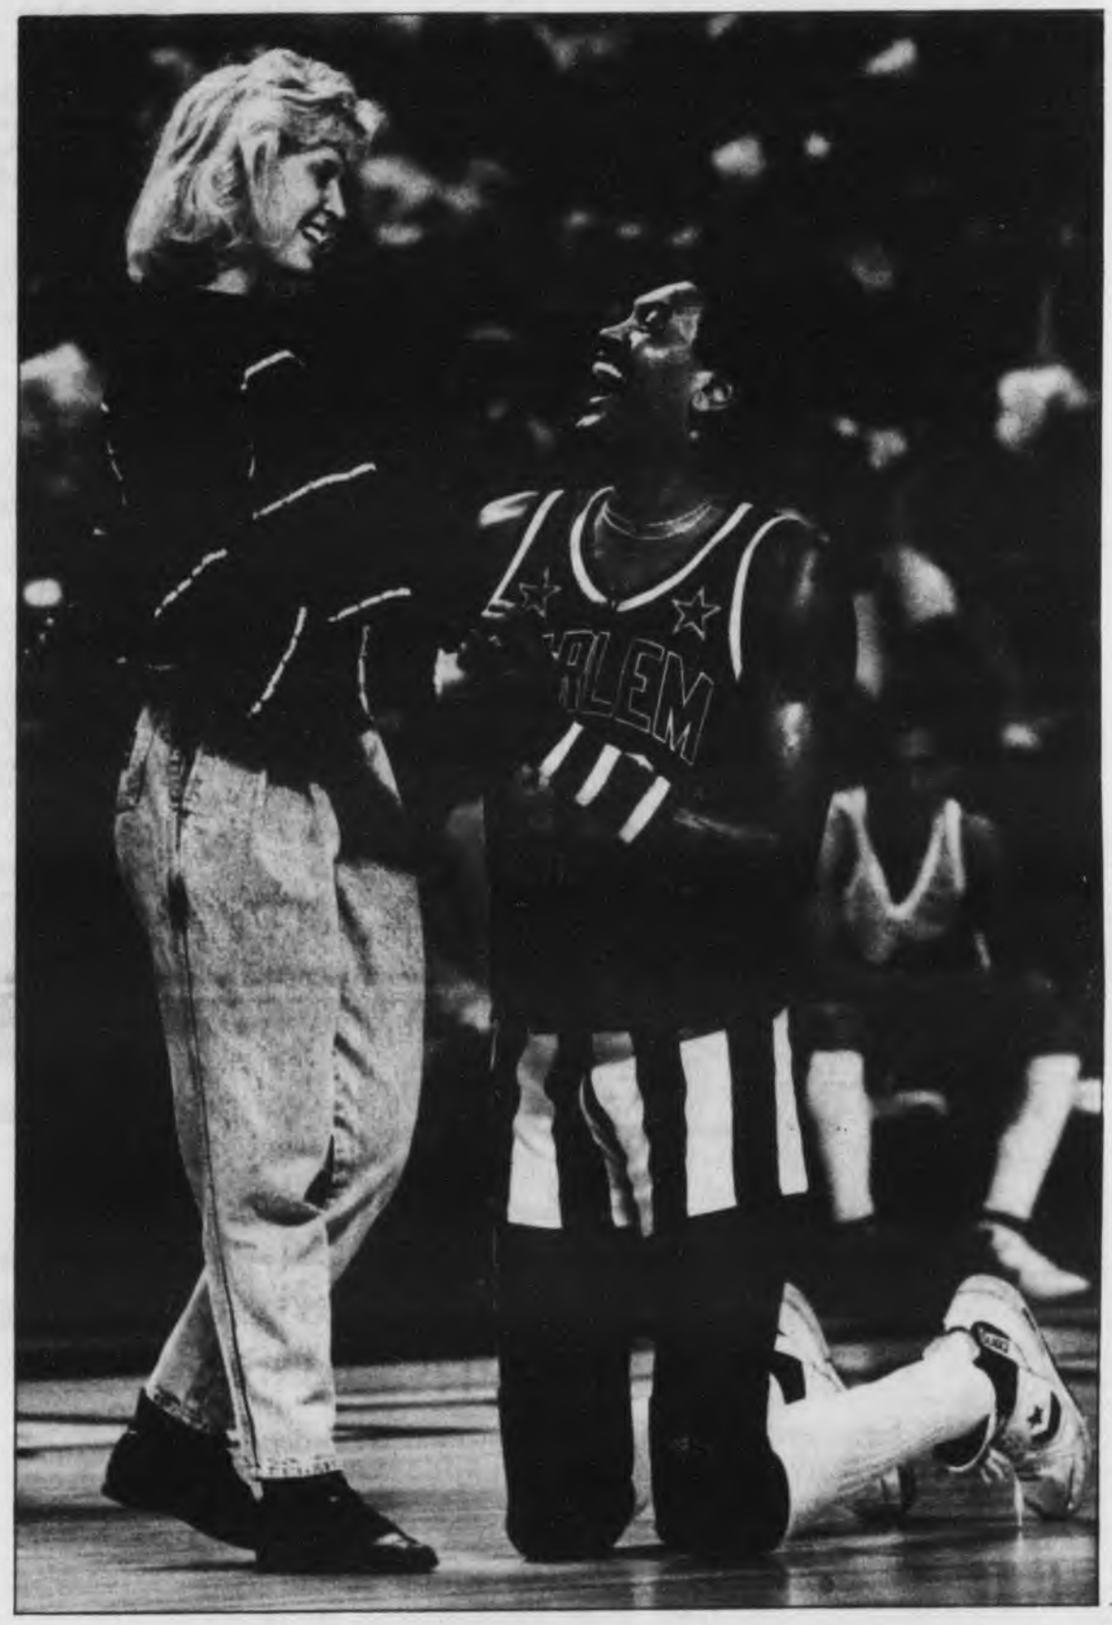
Ngubo returned home, put on a suit, bought a hat and returned to the office. When the man answered the door, she told him, "'I'm the man for the job.'

"I came into the labor movement through the back door," Ngubo said.

Wayne Nafziger, professor of economics, said he believed Ngubo's speech was realistic.

"She showed not only how clear a view it takes to liberate South Africa, but she was realistic about what has to be done," Nafziger said. "She's not fooling herself ... she realizes what they're up against."

Clive Fullagar, assistant professor of psychology, said he found two points in her speech to be of great importance: the "consistent restatement" of COSATU workers' call for sanctions; and the "importance of labor organizations as a political force."



Fullagar said he also didn't believe the audience realized the "tremendous amount of personal commitment by Ngubo. She's in a voluntary exile. If she goes back to South Africa, there is a high likelihood she will be arrested or detained."

Teach-in addresses South African interests

By Karen Allen
Staff Writer

President Jon Wefald said he "will ask the president of the (KSU) Foundation to review our (investment) policies and see where we square and where we don't square."

Wefald, an ex-officio member of the Foundation's 15-member executive committee, was reacting to information discussed in a teach-in Tuesday concerning the University's investments in South Africa. Wefald was not present at the teach-in.

Wefald's statement was the first indication the University may attempt to determine in what companies Foundation monies are invested.

In a telephone interview after the teach-in Michel Cavigelli, chairman of the investigation of investment of student funds committee, said the committee has been investigating possible investment in South African interests by the Foundation.

Initial findings show a "strong indication that there are student monies" invested in companies that financially support the apartheid government of South Africa, Cavigelli said.

Lou Douglas lecturer Nomonde Ngubo joined faculty and students at the teach-in, urging those in attendance to pressure the Foundation to divest student monies in companies doing business in South Africa.

"There's no point in sending money to South Africa. It doesn't go to the students — it goes to the military," said Ngubo, U.S. representative of the Confederation of South African Trade Unions.

Les Longberg, Foundation controller, said in a interview after the teach-in, "I don't feel any comment is appropriate" about the teach-in's

Custodians intimidated by schedule change

By Deborah Dinges
Collegian Reporter

A recent change in the schedules of some custodial workers has left them intimidated by their superiors.

"I have the impression that physical facilities custodians are being treated like second-class citizens," said Stanley Findley, chief steward of Chapter 11 of the Kansas Association of Public Employees. KAPE is the maintenance and service employees' union.

Since Jan. 9, about 30 custodial workers for 16 buildings have been starting their shifts at 4 a.m., two hours earlier than before, said Reba Snavely, who was assistant director of facilities custodial services at the time the shift adjustment was made. The shifts changed because of the high usage of these buildings.

Due to increased enrollment, more classrooms are being used throughout the day and must be cleaned before classes begin at 7:30 a.m., said Jack Watson, assistant director of facilities maintenance. Custodial workers didn't have enough time to complete the cleaning when starting at 6 a.m.

Snavely said to eliminate the problem, custodial workers either had to work early in the morning or at night.

"We're here to serve the needs of the University; this is the only way we know to do it," Watson said.

Supervisors have told Watson the employees enjoy working the new shift because they have more time to do their work, he said.

Rosezella Potter, supervisor I of facilities custodial services, said her employees don't like the new hours.

"We were getting the cleaning done before the schedule change," Potter said.

One advantage of the shift change is that employees are completing extra projects previously scheduled for summer, Watson said.

The employees under her supervision were completing some of the projects anyway, Potter said. The productivity accomplished at the beginning of the week is being counteracted by the fatigue workers suffer near the end of the week.

"By the end of the week, we're so tired we can't get things done," Potter said. "If we have to come in on the weekend, we can't do it."

But Watson said since the new schedule was implemented, only one employee has requested a change in schedule.

Findley said only one complaint has been made because employees have been discouraged from voicing their opinions about the schedule changes.

"Absolutely — intimidation is a serious problem that physical facilities custodians face," he said. "Some supervisors have learned that they can get away with the business of threatening and intimidating employees."

Snavely said she didn't think intimidation was occurring while she was assistant director of facilities. Two complaints concerning uniforms and problems in the training centers were submitted and dealt with while Snavely was with the office. These incidents demonstrate a lack of intimidation.

Snavely was assistant director of facilities from the end of June until Feb. 1.

"I wouldn't intimidate a worker because I don't tolerate it myself," said Lavatta Brumfield, supervisor II with facilities custodial services.

Brumfield said the supervisors she knows do not intimidate workers. The employees she supervises have been working the new schedule for more than a month and are happy.

Watson said he doesn't believe intimidation exists in the department and doesn't want his workers to believe as such.

"If workers think they have been intimidated by their supervisor, they should come to me," he said. Despite this, employees may be uncomfortable going to the administration.

"It's a different atmosphere," Watson said. "It seems like they want to go to their immediate supervisors. I don't want them to feel that way, but it's the nature of people."

Some employees on the new schedule are "scared to say something," Watson said.

Two custodians who were contacted refused to comment about the schedule change for fear of retribution from facilities management.

All the employees on the new schedule volunteered, Snavely said. They were given the choice to work the new hours or change to a different building.

"In a sense, we volunteered," Potter said. "We didn't really want to work the new hours, but we didn't want to change buildings."

Employees dislike building changes because after working in one facility awhile, they develop a social circle and peer relations in which they are comfortable, Snavely said.

"I know they're not happy about (having to change shifts or workplaces), but it couldn't be avoided," she said.

Some employees were dissatisfied with the notice they received before the new schedule was started, Potter said. The workers she supervises received notice of the change on the

Khomeini orders author killed

Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini on Tuesday ordered Moslems to kill the author and publishers of "The Satanic Verses," a novel he said has blasphemed Islam, and the author reportedly sought police protection.

The Iranian spiritual leader's order drew support and opposition from Moslems around the world. Salman Rushdie, author of "The Satanic Verses," said he was taking the threat "very seriously indeed."

Scotland Yard declined to comment on the British radio reports that Rushdie, who lives in London, had sought police protection.

Rushdie's agent, Gillon Aitken, said he would talk with his New York associates about whether a U.S. lecture tour, scheduled to begin Friday, should go ahead.

Student pays for 'true love'

CHICAGO — The U.S. Army has ordered a college student, who set off a nationwide search when he ran off with his new wife to find "perfect love," to serve four years as an enlisted man to work off his ROTC scholarship.

Scott Swanson, 24, will be permitted to finish college, delaying his induction to active duty until as late as May 1990, officials said. Swanson is working as a sales representative and continuing his education at an unidentified college.

Swanson can appeal and, if the Army approves, avoid service by paying back the $14,673 ROTC scholarship in a lump sum. "In most cases it is accepted," Capt. Charles R. Wade, an ROTC spokesman.

"I won't appeal," Swanson said Monday. "I will enlist."

Swanson violated his ROTC contract when he and his wife, Carolyn, 23, disappeared April 2 before he had completed his military and academic obligations at Wheaton College, a private Christian school. He had been scheduled to graduate last May.

Had Swanson completed the requirements, he would have had to serve four years as an officer.

Council passes KU extension

OVERLAND PARK — A $6 million University of Kansas extension campus was approved Monday night by the Overland Park City Council.

Final approval by the council followed more than a month of debate over apartment and retail developments tied to the campus site in the extreme southwest part of the city near Olathe.

The extension campus, as well as a proposed shopping center and apartment complex, will be built on about 155 acres at the northwest corner of 127th Street and Quivira Road. The rezoning approved Monday allows for a 1,160-unit apartment complex and a 53,000-square-foot shopping center.

KU wants to move its extension campus, also known as the Regents Center, because it has outgrown the Overland Park center that now serves about 1,500 students.

It was not known when development of the site would begin because part of the financing for the campus must be authorized by the Kansas Legislature. The campus will be located on a 38-acre site to be donated to the KU system by Clay Blair, who plans to develop some of the surrounding land.

Zoo pairs hog-like valentines

WICHITA — With the coat of a horse, the feet of a rhinoceros and a mug that neither clan would claim, Kohlrabi and Sandia may be ugly, but at least on this Valentine's Day, they have each other.

The two are Brazilian tapirs, a hog-like animal distantly related to both the equine and rhinoceros families, and members of an endangered species. But, thanks to the match-making efforts of the Sedgwick County Zoo, the pair has become an item. No small feat considering Sandia has proved particularly hard to please in the past.

"The last male we had for her was named Sparky, but she didn't take to him at all," said Vanessa Avara, a keeper at the zoo. "They were together for about five years, but they never did any breeding."

Within minutes of Kohlrabi's arrival last October from New Orleans, it was apparent the two would hit it off. They immediately began their courtship with low cries of "cluck, cluck, cluck," which seems to be Tapirese for "Hi, what's your sign?"

Hotels attuned to new market

By Bryan Ackley
Collegian Reporter

When women speak, hotel managers listen — or at least they're starting to.

The hotel industry has had to stand and take notice of traveling businesswomen because they have become the fastest growing market in the industry. In the near future, their numbers are expected to surpass those of travelling businessmen, said Donald MacLaurin, instructor of hotel and restaurant management.

MacLaurin said change is taking place primarily because women are establishing themselves in management-type positions, which has put more of them "on the road."

"The industry hasn't quite figured out what to do yet. At first, (hotel managers) went full-tilt to the right," MacLaurin said.

"They created special rooms, used pink decor and tried to make the rooms more feminine; however, the industry did more research and found out women really want about the same things as male travellers, except for a few things that are of relative importance to women," he said.

The industry's changes, mostly service-related, have been part of a decade-long transition, but MacLaurin emphasized the transition has resulted from "evolution rather than revolution."

Some of these changes include increased security, as many hotels now locate women closer to elevators and high traffic areas, and require them to be escorted to their rooms. Also, room service has expanded. Research has shown that women prefer dining in their rooms while travelling alone.

There has also been an amenities explosion — hair dryers, skirt hangers, beauty aids, valet parking, door-to-car service, limosines, special banquet menus for women's meetings, and concierge service — an errand service for no additional charge.

Fritz Pyle, general manager of the Manhattan Holiday Inn and Holidome, said he's observed a substantial increase in the number of travelling businesswomen staying at the Holidome, but few of them request any special treatment.

"Women guests don't want to be treated any differently than the men. They don't want to be catered to. They want to stand on their own two feet," Pyle said.

The Holidome will undergo a $700,000 renovation in the near future.

"We're going to change our color scheme to make (the Holidome) more appealling to everyone," he said.

The Holidome offers many conveniences.

"We have irons, ironing boards, hair dryers, toothbrushes and many other amenities available at our front desk, but these items are available to male guests as well as female," Pyle said.

Union Carbide settles lawsuit

By The Associated Press

NEW DELHI, India — Union Carbide Corp. agreed Tuesday to pay $470 million to the government of India in a court-ordered settlement resulting from the 1984 gas leak at Bhopal that killed more than 3,300 people in the world's worst industrial disaster.

Activists in Bhopal denounced the settlement as a betrayal of the 20,000 victims who still suffer from exposure to the deadly gas that escaped from a pesticides plant on Dec. 3, 1984. The government had sought $3 billion in damages.

Chief Justice R.S. Pathak interrupted a government prosecutor's routine argument when the court reconvened after lunch, and ordered the U.S.-based multinational company to pay the damages by March 31.

Attorneys for the government and Union Carbide promptly agreed.

"It was apparent that there was an out-of-court agreement between Union Carbide and the government," said a court official who spoke on condition of anonymity. "For such an order there should have been excitement, but there was no murmur even."

"It wasn't entirely out of the blue," said another source, who also spoke on condition of anonymity.

Pathak, citing "the enormity of human suffering," said a settlement was needed to "provide immediate and substantial relief."

More than 2,000 people were killed almost immediately when the white vapor of methyl isocyanate seeped from a storage tank at the plant operated by Union Carbide's Indian subsidiary and drifted over nearby shantytowns into Bhopal.

The leak occurred shortly after midnight and some victims died in their sleep. Others, blinded by tears and gasping for breath, tried to flee but collapsed in death.

More than 20,000 people still suffer from exposure to the gas and victims continue to die at a rate of at least one a day, according to a government gas relief board. It says the death toll has reached 3,329.

Pathak, speaking for a five-judge Supreme Court panel, ordered Union Carbide to pay $470 million to the Indian government "in full and final settlement of all claims, rights and liabilities related to and arising out of the Bhopal gas disaster."

He also ordered all civil proceedings transferred to the Supreme Court, and quashed all criminal charges, including one of culpable homicide filed in 1987 against former Union Carbide chairman Warren Anderson.

Pathak gave no details of how the money should be paid to the victims, but he directed government prosecutors and attorneys for the Danbury, Conn.-based company to submit a detailed agreement today.

"This is a fair and just settlement," Gopal Subramanium, one of the chief government attorneys, told a reporter.

In New York, Union Carbide spokesman Earl Slack said Pathak's order "was based on its review of all pleadings in India and the U.S., applicable law and facts, and the enormity of human suffering that requires substantial and immediate aid."

Union Carbide's stock price soared $2.12½ to $31.25 a share in early trading on the New York Stock Exchange Tuesday, and analysts said they approved of the settlement.

"Psychologically, it's terrific. Financially, it's reasonable," said Leslie Ravitz, a research director for Solomon Brothers in New York. "This relieves the pressure on Union Carbide and the stigma."

James Wilbur, a vice president with Smith Barney, Harris Upham and Co. Inc. in New York, said Union Carbide had set aside $200 million and had $250 million in insurance coverage.

"The risk is minimal," Wilbur said.

In Bhopal, a city of nearly 1 million people, many politicians and activists were angered by the settlement.

"This is a betrayal of the gas victims," said Babulal Gaur, a state legislator from the opposition Bharatiya Janata Party. He called the settlement "negligible."

"The government has once again come under the pressure from the lobby of multinationals," said Abdul Jabbar Khan, who mobilizes demonstrations of gas victims.

Committee approval of MOE encouraging

Higher education may have finally become a priority for the Kansas Legislature.

Or rather, the approval of full funding for the Margin of Excellence Plan by the 1989 Senate Ways and Means Committee Monday, at least maintains that hope.

But that sign, although encouraging, could also be misleading.

The 1988 Senate Ways and Means Committee recommended 100 percent funding last year, but the House did not. A compromise had to be worked out between it and the Senate; ultimately, only 83 percent of the MOE was funded.

History often repeats itself, but it is hoped that won't happen again this year in the Legislature.

Unlike Gov. Hayden, who recommended that the Legislature not fund $2.2 million of the MOE budget this year, the committee members, both then and now, obviously realize the importance of full funding for MOE in improving and maintaining the effectiveness of Kansas higher education.

If Hayden's recommendations are to be followed, 50 percent of mission-related enhancements for regents schools would not be funded.

Mission-related enhancements include materials such as library books and laboratory equipment — essentials for effective teaching. As Ways and Means Committee Chairman Sen. Gus Bogina, R-Shawnee, put it, "If you don't have the mission-related enhancements, you can't teach."

If higher education truly is a legislative priority as it should be, the Legislature as a whole will follow the example set by the Senate Ways and Means Committee, not that of Gov. Hayden, and vote to fund 100 percent of MOE.

Theatre performers deserve recognition

The basketball teams.

The football team.

These are the sort of groups that come to mind when one thinks about the kinds of groups that represent K-State out in the "real world."

Sure, image is important. Thus, when these teams do well in tough competition, it improves the image of the school. And, an improved school image can actually pay off in various forms, such as increased alumni support or increased student enrollment.

However, these large teams aren't the only groups that carry the University's image to the public.

Sure, some of the other, smaller teams have received more recognition due to their recent successes, like the debate team and the forensics team, but there is yet another group that deserves University-wide recognition.

This group is in tough regional competition, like the other teams, but it is not a team. It's a company: The Ebony Theatre Company, to be exact.

The Ebony Theatre Company has recently been selected to perform the production, "Wait Till Morning" at the American College Theater Festival regional competition Feb. 21-26 in Lawrence.

The play was chosen from numerous other productions to compete at the festival. While this alone is reason to applaud, the theater group was also the only group from K-State to be selected, as well as being the first group selected from the University to perform at the regional competition in the last 15 years.

The 11-year-old company will also be the only black student group to be performing at the regional competition.

It is exciting that this company will be able to represent K-State, however, it is also tragic that many students on campus have never attended an Ebony Theatre production.

This sort of quality performance will go a long way toward promoting the image of K-State. The Ebony Theatre Company certainly deserves a standing ovation.

Collegian Editorial Policies

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR are always encouraged. Those which pertain to matters of campus and/or public interest are especially encouraged, and are given the highest priority.

Letters should be kept as brief as possible, preferably under 300 words. Those who cannot condense their opinions should consider submiting their letter in the form of a guest column. All letters are subject to editing for space, style and taste.

GUEST COLUMNS are also encouraged. The column should be no longer than two double-spaced, typed pages. If the submission is used as a column and not a letter to the editor, it will be accompanied by the author's photograph.

Universities as guilty as students

Ethics, morals apply to all

Commentary

Scott Miller
Collegian Columnist

"Florida's universities have found themselves in a morals dilemma," begins an article in this month's issue of U., the national college newspaper.

In fact, "The signs are glaring." The theme of the article is a familiar one: America's students are concerned only with a quick buck and immediate gratification of libidinal drives. Their education, in accordance with the Zeitgeist of the Reagan era, has become a monetary, rather than intellectual, investment.

If one believes the pronouncements from this genre of reporting, then one might speculate that America's best and brightest have finally reached the pinnacle of bourgeois decadence.

To drive home the point, the article notes, "Administrators say the problem may be that many students have lost sight of what's right and wrong."

All of this is probably quite true. The problems mentioned in the article — drug use, academic dishonesty and especially rape — are serious, and to pretend they don't exist would be a mistake. They exist not only at Florida's universities but at universities all across the country.

But what the article never brings out is from whence the problem comes. The article claims Florida's universities are in a morals dilemma, but it cites, strangely enough, only student problems.

Usually when one speaks of a university, one means the decision makers at a university, not students. But nowhere does the article apply the same high-minded standards of morality to university officials as it does students.

In fact, if we are to take the article seriously, administrators not only have the solution to this crisis, but are themselves beyond question.

With bold determination, the Florida Regents and university administrators took decisive action to nip this problem in the bud, to root out this menace that is corrupting America's youth and threatening that very social institution upon which our freedom and democracy rest — the university.

In other words, they formed a committee on each campus to study the students' morals. Members of the committees were handpicked by university presidents, the article tells us with no apparent irony.

All of this implies that, unlike students, university administrators have not lost sight of what is right and wrong. The question is, have they ever had sight of it?

My intent is not to let students off the hook. I would simply like to suggest that the university management team — administrators, regents and other mostly white male businessmen who failed in the private sector — is itself not beyond question. One obvious example is the history of marketing university medical research.

It was more than two decades ago in "The Closed Corporation" that James Ridgeway asked, "Who would believe, for instance, that American universities could be a major factor in pressuring Congress to keep the prices of medicine high; that the patents to the high-priced drugs are held by such universities as Rutgers and the University of Wisconsin?"

And in his 1982 essay "Reason and Counterrevolution," Michael Ryan wrote, "When a major private university, upon whose board sit representatives of several major pharmaceutical firms, has some of its sizable investments in those same companies, and when one of those companies, the major manufacturer of Valium, funds a new department of therapy at the university in which the only method promoted is Valium treatment, then one has reason to suspect that such phrases as 'academic neutrality' and 'conflict of interest' have lost all critical significance."

But this is not to suggest things have not changed over the years. In fact, as Jon Weiner points out in the Jan. 2 issue of Nation magazine, things have changed significantly.

Last September, Harvard University announced it would raise $30 million in venture capital to form a company to market the biotechnology research of the Harvard Medical School faculty. According to Weiner, "What's new in the Harvard plan is the way it puts the university in the role played, until now, by the corporation."

"Other universities have been inviting biotech firms on campus, offering the profits from faculty research in exchange for funds and facilities. But Harvard has gone the next step by forming its own company ... and reserving part of the profits for itself."

The Harvard plan, Weiner notes, provides an unprecedented possibility of conflict of interest in the already questionable area of marketing medical research.

"While Harvard spokesmen were defending the (plan), a conflict of interest scandal erupted involving a researcher at a Harvard-affiliate hospital. He had violated regulations of the university and the Food and Drug Administration by testing a drug that had not been approved for experimental use and in which he had a financial stake."

According to Weiner, the researcher's supervisor also owned stock in the company and had praised the researcher's results although they were "clearly faulty and may have been fraudulent."

What all of this suggests is that the liberal notion of an ivory tower institution above the rough and tumble of social relations and isolated from the rest of the world is largely a myth perpetuated for ideological reasons. It also suggests that if there is, in fact, a dilemma of morals at America's universities, then it pertains to more than just students.

Letters

Column flawed

Editor,

I wish to take exception to the ill-informed commentary in Scott Miller's editorial of Feb. 9 regarding agricultural research at K-State and family farms.

For starters, there are few 'corporate' farms, by which I mean farms owned by large national corporations. I am aware of only one, that being a hog operation owned by DeKalb in Garden City.

By and large, a corporate farm in Kansas is a family farm that has been incorporated to take advantage of tax and liability insurance which incorporation allows. In other words, in Kansas, the corporate farm is the family farm.

Secondly, Miller implies that corporate farming is the opposite of sustainable agriculture. This is not correct.

A corporate farm could certainly take equal advantage of the concepts of sustainable agriculture. It may, in fact, benefit them more, as they can take advantage of the economics inherent in their large size.

Miller also implies that heavy pesticide and fertilizer use go hand in hand with heavy erosion. This is not true.

The movement in modern agriculture in the United States has been toward reduced tillage of crop land, so as to reduce soil erosion. However, since weed control is less effective in reduced tillage systems, increased herbicide use is necessary to maintain profitable yields. Hence, decreased soil erosion is correlated to increased pesticide use.

Miller also states that K-State is doing nothing about pollution in Tuttle Creek. The real pollution problem in Tuttle Creek is siltation of eroded soil off the surrounding farmlands, not 'petrochemicals' which are barely above the detection limit. K-State has extensively promoted reduced tillage agriculture and other soil conservation methods which will go a long way to mitigate the problems at Tuttle Creek and other reservoirs in the state.

Finally, the general thesis of the commentary, that K-State agricultural research is primarily for the benefit of private corporations, is also wrong.

K-State has extensive research programs in ground water pollution, efficient fertilizer usage, soil management and crop management which benefit all farmers in Kansas.

There is also an extensive overseas program in Africa which helps farmers on that continent grow crops economically within their social and political systems.

There is a comprehensive extension program at K-State which relays the information from research at the University out to the farmers throughout the state. This support system is of particular benefit to small farmers who may not be able to afford private consultants.

If Miller is really interested in helping the small farmer in Kansas, he should change his major to an agricultural science and learn what is required to really help these people. Otherwise, he should keep his ignorant views to himself.

Alcohol program

Editor,

Alcohol and its effects on our society have been swept under the carpet for many years. But today, they are receiving much attention. In fact, there is a clear indication that we are ready — and maybe even willing — to change our attitude toward this national tragedy.

Public radio stations KHCC and KHCD have teamed with St. Joseph Medical Center of Wichita and Pepsi-Cola Bottling Company to air two weekly programs which examine alcohol and its effects on our society: "Thinking about drinking" and "Alcohol in Kansas."

They can be heard at 7 p.m. Mondays through March 27.

I am impressed with their quality and contents, and I encourage everyone to listen. The programs neither condone nor discourage drinking; they merely inform of its consequences.

By understanding exactly what we are dealing with, then we can better understand the reasons for and consequences of this deadly disease. As president of the Sedgwick County Chapter of MADD (Mothers Against Drunk Driving), my concern is alcohol's effect on driving.

Please listen and pass this valuable information on to your friends and acquaintances. Unfortunatley, alcoholism is everyone's problem, not just the one of four American families whose daily life is directly affected by it.

Faculty rejects exam schedule

By Todd Jenkins
Collegian Reporter

Faculty Senate Monday failed to approve a proposed change in the schedule for finals exams. A majority decision was not reached and the issue was sent back to Academic Affairs Committee.

Student Senate Chairman Todd Johnson, testifying in favor of the bill, urged Faculty Senate to pass the proposed change in the schedule. He said students are mainly concerned with the number of exams taken each day, the actual number of test days and the fluctuation of the schedule.

"Because of these points, the proposed schedule would, overall, reduce the amount of stress and anxiety that students and faculty members go through during the final examination period," Johnson said.

Faculty senators agreed with the points, but said they believe class days should not be sacrificed.

"I felt there was strong sentiment against the seven-day exam schedule because it took up two class days," Wayne Nafziger, Academic Affairs Committee chairman, said after the Senate meeting. "I'm not sure whether the faculty will be for the seven-day schedule if two class days are added or if they will be for the status quo."

The issue will be reviewed by the Academic Affairs Committee, Nafziger said. Response and opinions voiced by students and the faculty will be reviewed. Discussion will follow regarding changes the committee may find acceptable.

In other business, Faculty Senate unanimously approved the proposed joining of the Faculty Grievance Board and the Discrimination Review Board.

The boards originally existed for different reasons. The Grievance Board heard problems between University administration and faculty members and dealt with issues such as promotions and salaries, but did not have set procedures. The Discrimination Review Board heard discrimination cases and did have a clear set of procedures.

Combining the boards into one with a clear set of procedures is intended to assure that all types of complaints will be dealt with more efficiently by the one board.

Secretary of State to sell personal stock

By The Associated Press

ROME — Secretary of State James A. Baker III announced Tuesday he will sell his holdings in a New York bank and all his other publicly traded stock, a move prompted by questions from President Bush's ethics chief about potential conflicts of interest.

Baker said the decision went "well beyond" what was required by law or had been recommended to him by government lawyers.

Baker's decision, which a spokesman said had been reached Saturday but was announced Tuesday, came as Senate Foreign Relations Committee sources said the panel had asked Baker more than a week ago for additional detailed information about his holdings.

The controversy revolves primarily around Baker's holdings in Chemical New York Corp., which has lent $4.5 billion to Third World nations.

As Bush's chief adviser on foreign policy, Baker is certain to be confronted by the nagging problem of the indebted nations and their staggering loans to Western and other commercial banks.

While heading the Treasury Department under President Reagan, Baker developed the so-called Baker plan, which called on Third World nations to make good on their debts as they restructured their sagging economies. It called for new public and private lending, and did not seek to force the banks to forgive the loans.

Baker's stock holdings are in a qualified blind trust. A trustee controls the stocks and tells Baker annually of the general nature of the holdings.

Last Soviets leave Afghanistan

By The Associated Press

KABUL, Afghanistan — Military transport planes carried the last Soviet soldiers home from Kabul Tuesday, a Red Army officer said, leaving a conscript Afghan army to defend the capital alone for the first time in nine years.

A few young Afghan soldiers, outside the airport gates, watched the Soviet soldiers board the planes in gray dress uniforms and fur hats.

Moslem guerrillas, who began fighting after a communist coup in 1978, have surrounded and blockaded the cold, hungry city for months.

They fired five rockets into Kabul Tuesday, the day before the deadline for Soviet withdrawal. One killed four children and an old man lined up in the snow for bread, the state radio reported.

Two landed at the airport in the first such attack on the facility for more than a month. They struck near a runway but Soviet soldiers still at the airport said no one was injured.

Poland closed its Kabul embassy Tuesday and evacuated the few remaining diplomats, as Hungary had done last week.

Western nations, including the United States, closed their legations earlier. The Soviets are keeping their embassy open, but the staff has been reduced from more than 300 to about 100.

A council called by guerrilla leaders to choose an interim Moslem government for Afghanistan convened Friday in Pakistan. They deteriorated into arguments between moderates and fundamentalists, including how to divide representation between the Sunni Moslem majority and Shiite minority.

Insurgents claim the government of President Najib will fall soon after the Soviets are gone. The interim government would arrange elections and adminster the country until they were held.

Soviet soldiers entered Afghanistan in December 1979 and an estimated 115,000 were in the country when the withdrawal began May 15, 1988, under a U.N.-mediated agreement. Today is the deadline for all to be gone.

In Moscow, Foreign Ministry spokesman Vadim Perfilev said the Soviet pullout was exactly on schedule and the last Soviet soldier would be out of Afghan territory by the deadline.

Student charged in case

From Staff and Wire Reports

A 20-year-old K-State student was sentenced Monday to two years probation for the aggravated vehicular homicide of a girl who was killed in a motorcycle-police car crash in November.

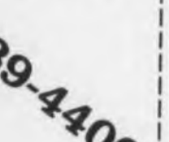
Sean McDougal, freshman in business administration, was found guilty of aggravated vehicular homicide for driving the motorcycle involved in the crash that resulted in the death of passenger Sandie Oakleaf, 17, of Effingham.

District Judge Paul Miller sentenced him to a term of one to three years. McDougal, who pleaded no contest to the charge in January, was ordered to spend the first 30 days of his sentence in the Riley County Jail before going on probation.

McDougal was traveling north on Seth Child's Road when a Riley County officer clocked his speed at an excess of 80 mph and proceeded to give chase, said Riley County Attorney Bill Kennedy. His motorcycle had crashed into a Riley County Police Department patrol car acting as a road block on U.S. Highway 24.

Police estimated McDougal was traveling at about 30 to 40 mph when the collison occurred. McDougal had seen the patrol car blocking the road and was attempting to slow down, Kennedy said.

Both passengers were thrown from the motorcycle and Oakleaf suffered fatal head injuries. Oakleaf was not wearing a helmet at the time of the crash, Kennedy said.



"McDougal was driving in violation of a restricted license when the accident occurred," he said.

At the time of the accident, McDougal was already on probation for reckless driving, fleeing and eluding.

The maximum sentence for vehicular homicide is 5 years in prison, Miller said. The minimum is a one-year jail sentence.

Other terms of McDougal's sentence include undergoing psychological testing and treatment, completing 200 hours of community service and maintaining full-time employment. He must also pay a fine, court costs and medical expenses for psychological treatment. His driver's license will be revoked while he is on probation, Kennedy said.

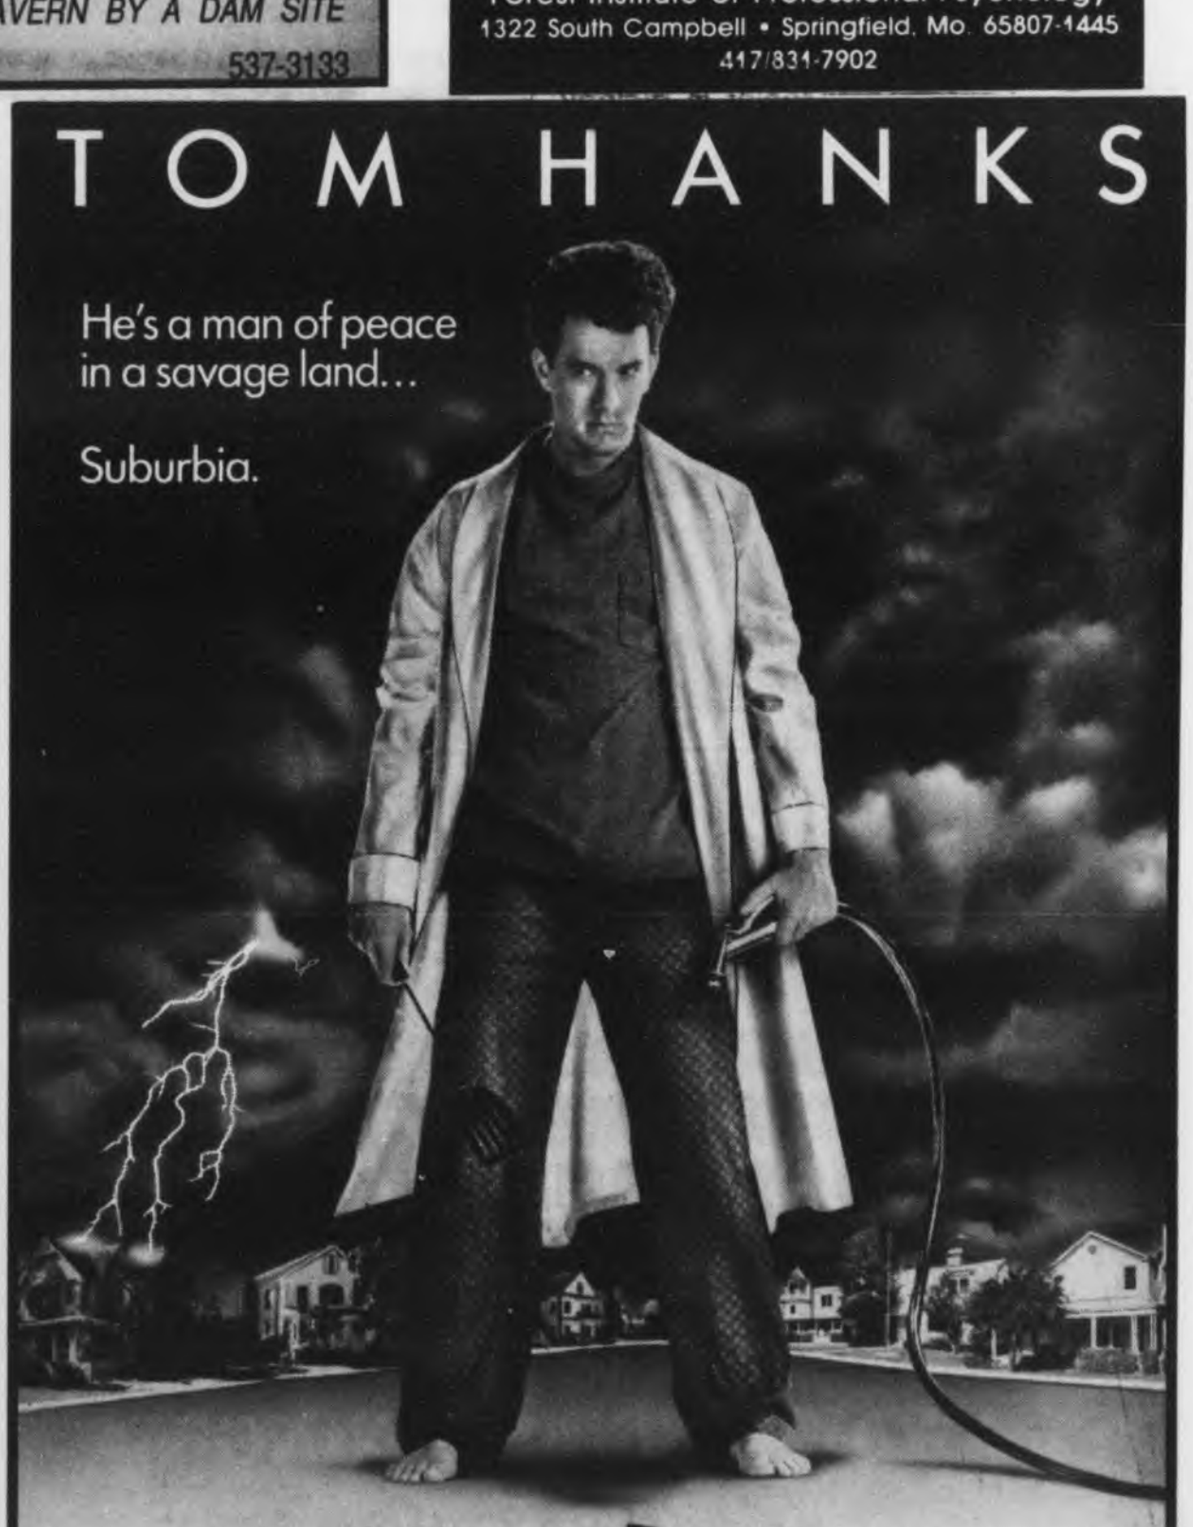
LOGO CONTEST

RECREATIONAL SERVICES WOULD LIKE A NEW LOGO

$150.00 will be awarded to the student with the best logo that is accepted by the Rec Services Council. Logo entries must be camera ready artwork.

The Logo should:



1. Be Versatile. The logo must be functional and work in a variety of media. It should re-produce well on all types of surfaces, printing processes (embossed, foil stamped), papers, and in different sizes from business cards to billboards and also on T-shirts and staff shirts.
2. Be unique. Logo is to be original, distinctive, and memorable.
3. Be simple. Using strong areas and a minimum of lines.
4. Have a distinctive typeface. Typeface should be chosen so as to not date the department and make logo obsolete.
5. Identify. The logo must simply tell what Recreational Services is all about, present department as a leader, and must easily identify the department.

The mission of Recreational Services is to provide intramural/recreational sports and fitness/wellness programs to the University community. This includes students, faculty/staff, and alumni.

DEADLINE FOR ENTRIES: MARCH 22, 1989 BY 5:00 p.m. in the Recreational Services office.

Questions can be directed to Raydon H. Robel, Director at the Recreational Services offices located in the Rec Complex or call 532-6980.

When words have no sound

Deaf student adapts to University life

To say Andy McDavitt, senior in biology, is not a typical K-State student may be an understatement. Of the 250 million people living in the United States, fewer than 1 percent are deaf. Of the 19,301 students attending K-State, fewer than 8 percent maintained a 4.0 grade point average last semester. Andy McDavitt fits into both of those groups.

McDavitt has been deaf since age 5, when he was stricken with meningitis, an inflammation of the spinal cord. From that time he and his family began learning sign language.

McDavitt has attended K-State for four years and plans to apply to veterinary school. He has interpreters who translate class lectures into sign language for him.

Working with interpreters was not a new situation to McDavitt. He attended Wichita's public school system where deaf students are merged into regular classrooms with interpreters.

Outside of class, McDavitt reads lips when communicating with people who don't know sign language, and he can speak and write. In his

"People did stare, but mostly at the interpreter, not at me."

—Andy McDavitt senior in biology room he uses a computer terminal which can be connected to his phone or used as a word processor to relay conversations.

McDavitt said that in the classroom, students are curious at first.

"My first day of classes at K-State, I wasn't nervous because I've been doing this all my life," McDavitt said through his computer. "People did stare, but mostly at the interpreter, not at me."

To compensate for his deafness, McDavitt said he has become sensitive to light. His room in Moore Hall is equipped with a doorbell that causes the room's lights to blink, and he uses a lamp connected to an alarm clock to wake him up in the morning.

"He's very light sensitive, so I have to be careful not to turn on the light and wake him up in the morning," said Viet Phan, his roommate and a sophomore in business.

McDavitt has had a driver's license since he was 16.

"You don't need to hear to drive," he said. "All you need are quick reflexes, good sight and brains."

Because it is difficult to read lips in dim light, McDavitt doesn't like to go to bars, but he has attended dances sponsored by his residence hall. Last week, Kathy Kaldor, junior in pre-med, went to a formal dance with him.

"It was great," she said. "He's such a good dancer. He told me he can feel the vibrations of the music and that's how he dances."

Music sparks McDavitt's curiosity. He said he can't remember sounds from before he became deaf. Music is one thing he would like to hear, if possible.

Andy McDavitt, senior in biology, watches Natalee Lindsay, third year student in veterinary medicine, translate the lecture into sign language while the instructor used a slide to illustrate the details of the cell structure during the cell biology class. McDavitt plans to apply to veterinary school.

"I would like to find out what kind of music I like and don't like," McDavitt said. "Music is what I miss the most."

He has a collection of song lyrics, as well as other kinds of poetry, and has memorized the words of more than 300 songs and poems, he said.

McDavitt's mother, Billie, is a sign language interpreter at a junior high school in Wichita. She became involved with the hearing impaired when her son became deaf. She has taught sign language classes at Wichita State University and has taken part in a number of workshops.

Billie McDavitt said when she and her husband learned their son was deaf, their first thoughts concerned his future.

"At first, mainly we wondered about his education, whether he would be able to learn to read normally," she said. "Because Andy is intelligent and could read, he educated himself a lot. At times he would check out as many as 50 or 60 books in a week."

The McDavitts were a little nervous when their son left for college.

"I suppose all parents feel some apprehension when their child leaves home," she said. "But we both had a great deal of faith in Andy. He's always been able to make his own decisions and work for them."

Natalee Lindsay, third year student in veterinary medicine, is one of McDavitt's three interpreters and translates for him in cell biology class.

McDavitt sits in the front row of his classes with an interpreter directly in front of him. Volunteers in each class take notes because it is impossible for McDavitt to watch an interpreter and take notes at the same time.

"There are a lot of technical terms in that class that there aren't signs for, which makes it a little harder," Lindsay said. "We just have to work out a little system of our own."

Lindsay has worked as an interpreter since she was in junior high school. She became interested in working with the deaf when she was a child because one of her friends was deaf.

Lindsay and McDavitt are friends beyond their student/interpreter roles, even though she said most of the students and interpreters do not usually have friendships.

"He's such a good dancer. He told me he can feel the vibrations of the music and that's how he dances."

— Kathy Kaldor junior in pre-med

Lindsay said some special considerations must be kept in mind when being friends with a deaf person.

"You have to remember to face him when you're talking to him, and you have to explain things that he would need to hear to understand otherwise," she said.

Kelley Sayyar, senior in biology, has been in five classes with McDavitt. She said having an interpreter signing in front of the class is not distracting.

"The very first time you're in a class with an interpreter, your attention is brought to it, but after that, you don't even notice," Sayyar said.

Interpreters are matched with students by Gretchen Holden, coordinator of special services. She said five interpreters work with the two deaf students who know sign language.

Other hearing impaired students read lips and are assisted by students who take notes; however, "the interpreter system is most effective," Holden said.

"At the college level, getting 30 percent of (the lecture) — as you do with lip reading — just doesn't cut it," Holden said. "Andy can go into a lecture in microbiology and understand what the instructor is saying 100 percent with a sign language interpreter."

Interpreters are conscientious about attending each class period, she said.

"They're incredibly responsible," Holden said. "They know that this student's graduation and career are riding on their reliability."

The interpreters are paid an hourly wage for their services. The wages come from state funds for the handicapped, she said.

If McDavitt is accepted to the vet school, the interpreting system will become more complicated, Holden said. Classes in the veterinary medicine program are held from 7:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. with a one-hour lunch break. The class length may be a strain for the interpreter, who needs regular breaks between signing.

McDavitt said he realizes he may not be accepted to vet school but prefers to remain optimistic.

"I'm going to be a vet," he said.

"The first time I decided I wanted to be a vet was when somebody poisoned my dog, and its stomach was burned out because the vet couldn't do anything," McDavitt said. "I told myself, 'I'm going to be a vet so that nothing like that ever happens to me or anyone else again.'

"I was only seven, but I haven't changed my mind."

Andy McDavitt, senior in biology, communicates through a computer in his room in Moore Hall. He uses the terminal to relay conversations by phone.

Aggieville access difficult for physically limited

By Dave Young
Collegian Reporter

For the physically limited, Aggieville is a difficult and dangerous place to travel.

"The effort involved isn't worth what's accessible to me," said Tom Leikam, sophomore in journalism and mass communications.

Leikam explained that traveling in his wheelchair through Aggieville is dangerous and almost impossible.

"Dealing with the extra distance isn't the worst part; competing with the cars in the street is. It's like sticking your head in a lion's mouth. Once you're in the street, you're committed; your life is in the hands of the guy driving the car. You're down low and can't move very fast. Drivers can't see you until they're on top of you," Leikam said.

The lack of curb cuts is the main problem with handicap inaccessibility in Aggieville, Leikam said.

"The intersection of 12th and Moro streets has no curb cuts on any of the four corners," Leikam said. "If you want to cross 12th Street, you have to go to an alley, either north or south of the intersection, cross over to the other side, and then back to the intersection.

"If you just want to cross Moro Street, you have to go all the way to one of the ends of Aggieville and then back up the other side. That's a stupid way to have to cross the street," Leikam said.

The lack of curb cuts is forcing handicap individuals "into the streets," where they're vulnerable, he said.

"There's a law that requires any new or renovated buildings or sidewalks to be handicap accessible," Leikam said. "That explains why there are places in Aggieville with curb cuts on only one side of the road. You can get down into the street, in those places, but then you're stuck," he said.

Gretchen Holden, coordinator of special services at K-State, said the situation in Aggieville is annoying to her.

Holden explained that another problem in Aggieville for the handicapped is the entrances of the businesses.

"Many of the places in Aggieville have a step at their entrance," she said. "That one step keeps handicap people from being able to go in."

Holden said she understands the financial difficulties of Aggieville, but wonders why no progress in accessibility was seen when Aggieville was doing well.

"This was an area that made a lot of money off of students," Holden said. "Why didn't some of the money go to accessibility improvement?

"There was a push to improve handicap accessibility in Aggieville, but then (Manhattan Town Center) took the spotlight and the push for improved accessibility in Aggieville disappeared."

The executive director of the Aggieville Merchants Association, Juli Salberg, said the problem in Aggieville will be greatly reduced if the proposed Aggieville improvement plan passes.

"The plan includes curb cuts at almost every corner," Salberg said.

"The city commissioners will announce their decision on the proposed plan (Tuesday)," Salberg said.

The proposed plan wouldn't help the problems with the entrances or the lack of bathrooms equipped for the handicapped, however.

Bruce McCallum, director of public works, said other than the proposed improvement plan, no other improvement plans for Aggieville's handicap accessibility exist.

"We've tried to upgrade, but it's a gradual process that will take time," McCallum said.

For those confined to wheelchairs, the proposed Aggieville improvement plan might be the only quick solution to their problem.

"I understand their problem with lack of funds, but it doesn't help me very much," Leikam said.

The Harlem Blues and Jazz Band
Friday, February 24, 8 p.m.

"They jumped, bopped, and kicked out the slickest, coolest jazz ever written, and the audience couldn't get enough." That's how one critic summed up a performance by these seven New York jazz elders. Vocalist Laurel Watson joins this all-star convocation of original masters from the Golden Age of Swing for an evening of gutsy, bluesy spontaneity and sublime solos.

"It's unfair to call this gathering of veteran jazzmen a band. They're more like a congregation of magicians. The music they stirred up had their concert feeling more like a jazzed-up version of an old camp meeting."

Cage squads to meet Colorado tonight

Lady Cats to face No. 15 Lady Buffs

By Mike Rouse
Collegian Reporter

A streak of tough road games will come to an end for the K-State women's basketball team tonight as it travels to Boulder to play the Big Eight Conference-leading Colorado Lady Buffs in a 5:05 p.m. (6:05 p.m. CST) tipoff.

K-State, 16-7 overall and 6-4 in the Big Eight, will be ending a three-game road trip that has not seen a victory for the Lady Cats so far. After two consecutive losses to Iowa State and Nebraska, K-State coach Matilda Mossman said she knows this game will be the toughest of the trip. A win for the Lady Buffs will give Colorado the outright Big Eight regular season title.

"They are playing so well right now it doesn't matter where we play them," Mossman said.

Colorado dealt K-State its only loss in Bramlage Coliseum this year, defeating the Lady Cats, 75-63, Jan. 14. The Lady Cats shot only 44 percent from the field in the game. Colorado led by as many as 20 points in the second half before K-State went on a run late in the game to make the score a little more respectable. Colorado's Anna Wilson hit a school record seven 3-point goals en route to a 25-point performance.

"We got beat by a team that just played better than we did. It is as simple as that," Mossman said afterward.

A main concern of Mossman's has been rebounding. The Lady Cats have outrebounded their opponents in the last three games, though, including a four-rebound advantage in the loss to Iowa State.

During the last four games, the Lady Cats averaged 42.5 rebounds a game.

"We are doing a better job. We aren't giving up as many cheap baskets as we were earlier," Mossman said, "and our offense is doing a good enough job now."

Nadira Hazim continues to lead the Lady Cats in scoring, averaging 14.9 points a game.

Colorado enters the contest ranked No. 15 in the country with a 20-3 record overall and a 10-0 mark in conference play. The Lady Buffs are coming off a 76-59 thrashing of Oklahoma State Saturday night.

Colorado is led by Bridget Turner, who is averaging 14.9 points and seven rebounds a game. Crystal Ford is averaging 12.3 points and Rosland Starks 10.3.

"We need to be patient on offense, make good decisions offensively and play at our pace, not theirs," Mossman said.

Wildcats on road at CU

By Mike Goens
Sports Writer

K-State travels to Boulder, Colo. tonight to take on the Colorado Buffaloes at 7:35 p.m. (8:35 p.m. CST) in the CU Events Center.

"They (Colorado) have won their last two games at home ... they are so much improved that we have a lot to be concerned about," K-State coach Lon Kruger said. "We need to be ready for a battle or we're gonna be surprised and disappointed."

K-State, 14-7 overall and 5-4 in the Big Eight, is coming off wins last week against Iowa State, 104-89, and Nebraska, 80-66. Colorado is 7-14 overall and 2-6 in the conference.

The 'Cats continue to be paced by the backcourt tandem of Steve Henson and LaKeith Humphrey. Humphrey was rewarded for his play last week by being named Big Eight Conference player of the week Monday.

The Buffaloes are led by 6-foot-10 sophomore center Shaun Vandiver. Vandiver is averaging 19 points and just more than 10 rebounds a game. Senior forward Brian Robinson averages a little more than 12 points a game and sophomore guard Steve Wise contributes 10 for CU.

K-State used a second-half surge to pull away from Colorado, 98-84, in the first conference meeting between the two teams at Bramlage Coliseum. It was K-State's highest scoring effort of the season to that point, and has been topped only by the 104 points against Iowa State Thursday.

"They gave us a tough time here — it was tied with about nine minutes left," Kruger said, "so we know what to expect."

Steve Henson led six Wildcats in double figures, scoring 26 points and adding 11 assists. Reggie Britt chipped in 14 points for the 'Cats. The Buffs were paced by Vandiver

Iowa State upsets No. 3 Missouri

Loss comes after coach has colon cancer surgery

By The Associated Press

AMES, Iowa — Victor Alexander and Terry Woods scored 19 points each and reserve Marc Urquhart added five key points in the final 2 minutes to lead Iowa State to an 82-75 upset of No. 3-ranked Missouri on Tuesday night.

Iowa State rallied from an early 7-0 deficit in the Big Eight Conference game to beat Missouri for the fourth straight time in Ames and hand the Tigers their second loss in three games since Coach Norm Stewart was hospitalized for a bleeding ulcer.

The game was played only hours after it was revealed that Stewart also had cancer of the colon and a diseased gall bladder. Assistant coach Rich Daly has been guiding the Tigers in Stewart's absence.

Missouri, 21-5, fell into second place in the conference at 7-2 — a half-game behind Oklahoma. Iowa State improved to 12-9 and 3-6.

Sam Mack scored 15 points for Iowa State, 13 in the second half, and Urquhart finished with a career-high 13. Byron Irvin and Doug Smith led Missouri with 16 points each, Lee Coward scored 14 and reserve Greg Church 10.

Stewart, who was hospitalized last week, underwent surgery in a Columbia, Mo., hospital Tuesday morning, and doctors removed a cancerous tumor from his colon and his gall bladder. He was listed in satisfactory condition.

"During the evaluation of the source of the gastro-intestinal bleeding, it was found that Norm Stewart was suffering from gall bladder disease and cancer of the colon," a Columbia Regional Hospital news release said.

"Surgery was performed this morning to remove both the cancerous tumor and the diseased gall bladder. The surgery was successful and Coach Stewart tolerated the procedure well.

"He is currently in satisfactory condition and treatment for his ulcer disease continues. He will remain hospitalized for at least one week."

An 8-0 run at the end of the first half and a 5-0 spurt to start the second half gave Iowa State a 40-33 lead and the Cyclones trailed only once after that.

Coward's three-point play and his three-point basket from the right corner pulled Missouri into a 50-49 lead with 14:18 left, but Woods nailed a 3-pointer and Urquhart hit a short jump shot to put Iowa State up 54-50 and the Cyclones led the rest of the way.

Iowa State led by as many as eight points before Missouri scored seven straight points to cut the lead to 66-65 on Smith's jumper with 5:34 left. But Alexander and Woods hit consecutive baskets to return the momentum to Iowa State.

The Cyclones then held off Missouri with Urquhart's clutch shooting. The 6-foot-4 senior hit an 18-foot jump shot as the shot clock was about to expire to give Iowa State a 73-66 lead with 1:49 remaining, and he converted a three-point play with 1:21 left for a 78-68 lead.

After Iowa State rallied from its early deficit to a 7-7 tie, Missouri pulled out to a 27-19 lead and was ahead 33-27 after Church sank two free throws with 2:06 left in the half. But the Tigers missed their final four shots of the period and Iowa State scored eight straight points — four by Urquhart — to go ahead 35-33 at halftime.

OU quarterback detained in jail

By The Associated Press

OKLAHOMA CITY — A federal magistrate ordered Oklahoma quarterback Charles Thompson temporarily jailed Tuesday pending the outcome of a detention hearing on his drug-related arrest.

Thompson was taken into custody Monday on a complaint of selling cocaine to an undercover FBI agent.

The detention hearing before U.S. Magistrate Robin Cauthron was continued until Tuesday because a preliminary hearing is scheduled.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Bob Mydans said he sought the delay in order to determine the amount of bail he would seek for Thompson, who is being held in the Oklahoma County Jail.

Thompson is the fifth Oklahoma football player to be suspended since the NCAA placed the Sooners on a three-year probation in December, when the NCAA criticized Coach Barry Switzer for failure to "exercise supervisory control" over the program.

Gov. Henry Bellmon said he was "thoroughly surprised and disgusted" to learn of Thompson's arrest on the cocaine complaint.

Bellmon said he talked to David Swank, the university's interim president, about Thompson's arrest and the other incidents that have hit the football program.

Athletic department at Oklahoma getting out of control

Mid-Week Commentary

TOM MORRIS
Sports Columnist

It's not often that a publication such as USA Today makes mistakes. In Friday's edition, the cover story headline said: "Oklahoma football hits all-time low."

It couldn't have been more wrong.

The story detailed the demise of the Sooners' football program since Oklahoma was placed on three years probation for recruiting violations. It said the NCAA infractions committee concluded, among other things in December, that Switzer and the university had failed to exercise appropriate institutional control over the football program.

Since that ruling, starting cornerback Jerry Parks has been kicked off the team for the January shooting of teammate Zarak Peters. Three players were charged with first-degree rape. The USA Today article said football players also were among eight athletes charged in October with trespassing after a mural in a minority cultural center was damaged.

The article also said that two weeks ago, starting offensive tackle Mark VanKeirsbilck was charged with striking a graduate student outside a Norman, Okla., bar.

Then Monday night, OU quarterback Charles Thompson was arrested by FBI agents on a complaint of selling cocaine to an undercover agent. FBI spokesman Dan Vogel said Thompson was arrested at about 9 p.m. Monday in Norman on a federal complaint that he allegedly sold 17 grams of cocaine for $1,400 to an undercover agent Jan. 26.

Not everything is "OK in Oklahoma," to paraphrase a line from the musical.

Said Dr. Edward Blick, an engineering professor for 30 years at OU and a member of the school's faculty senate: "The athletic program has gotten way out of hand. The tail's wagging the dog."

Oklahoma Athletic Director Donnie Duncan has gone to the university's board of regents with some proposals to help alleviate the problems.

His recommendations include beefing up the supervision of athletic dorms with a university police-trained student security force and more strictly enforcing the curfews for female visitors.

He has also hired Tony Hill as the university's assistant athletic director for academics. Hill will screen prospective athletes while they're still in high school. He will also oversee an overall academic crackdown in the athletic department.

In a statement of most profound wisdom, Duncan told USA Today: "This is no guarantee. By no means am I making a claim that we're eliminating every problem; no athletic director can. But we can certainly relieve them."

Besides putting his foot in his mouth with that ridiculous statement, Duncan managed to add a quote in the same article that said: "Oklahoma deserves better and it will have better."

That quote should be changed to "Oklahoma deserves the death penalty in football and it will have the death penalty."

Duncan, Coach Barry Switzer and the university have let the fire rage into an inferno before attempting to extinguish it. It needs reorganization, and an exemption from competition is the perfect way to solve it.

In a criminal case, if you screw up and get caught, you're subject to a fine and/or a jail sentence. Oklahoma's fine would be a stiff $10 million annually if its football program were to receive the death penalty.

It can be argued the NCAA doesn't rule on criminal matters. It's also true the university hasn't violated NCAA rules. But it's absurd to say a criminal violation as major as first-degree rape or selling cocaine doesn't violate NCAA policies.

Obviously the University of Oklahoma can't handle the situation. And its athletic director admitted there is no way to eliminate every problem.

There is a way, though. It's just that sometimes the worst has to happen before the good can begin to filter through.

Custodians

Friday before the new schedule went into effect.

According to the Department of Labor, if an employer changes a worker's schedule, the worker must be notified prior to the beginning of the work week. In the case of the custodial workers, the latest time facilities services could inform workers of the schedule change was 12:01 a.m. Sunday, Snavely said.

"That's not ethical, but it's legal."

Before Christmas break, a meeting conducted by Charlotte Morgan, supervisor II in physical facilities services, informed employees of the changes.

A memo was distributed a week before the new schedule was to be implemented, Snavely said. But employees knew their schedules would be changed before the memo through the meeting with Morgan.

discussion.

"The money in South Africa is dirty money," said Beata Lipman, a British journalist, filmmaker and guest lecturer in journalism classes this semester. "It is propping up apartheid which is a sick system."

Apartheid means separateness in Afrikaans, the official language of South Africa. Under apartheid, the 4.5 million whites control the 29 million blacks and Indians, Lipman said. Divestment is the selling of finances in companies involved in South Africa, who indirectly support apartheid by providing the government with goods and services.

Wayne Nafziger, professor of economics, said "we need to divest because it's right. And if we can't do it because it's right then let's do it because it's prudent and wise."

The Black Student Union, Students for Educational Awareness, and Uhuru sponsored the teach-in to address questions about "whether divestment is a good idea," said Paige Nichols, SEA member.

Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities, said at least $400,000 in student monies is invested through the Foundation. The Foundation invests the money through the Common Fund, which was chartered by Congress in 1971 as an organization to manage the pooled money of university foundations.

Although the student committee has received information from the Common Fund about the University's investment plan, Cavigelli said they have not yet been able to decipher where all student monies are invested.

But they do know the Foundation has opted not to use the South Africa Free Equity Fund, a fund option in the Common Fund which ensures investments are in companies that do not conduct business in South Africa.

with 24 points and Robinson with 15 points.

Henson and Humphrey are bringing comparisons to the purple pop gun twins, Mike Evans and Chuckie Williams, of 15 years ago.

Against Iowa State, Henson led the 'Cats with 19 points and nine assists, while Humphrey had 18 points, five assists and six rebounds.

The guards each scored 25 points in the win against Nebraska. Humphrey added seven steals and seven assists.

The 'Cats schedule won't get any easier after the CU game. K-State travels to Wichita State for a 7:05 p.m. Sunday tipoff with the Shockers. From there, the 'Cats head for Norman and a rematch with No. 1 Oklahoma in a 9:10 p.m. Wednesday contest. Both games will be televised nationally.

Film focuses on personal effects of apartheid

By Mark Schreiner
Collegian Reviewer

The film "A World Apart" tells the story of a young girl whose parents have been torn from her because of their involvement with the anti-apartheid movement in South Africa — the movie is personal, not political.

The story centers on Molly, played by Jodhi May, who is the 13-year-old daughter of left-wing journalist Diana Roth, played by Barbara Hershey. The film is based on the autobiographical screenplay of the daughter of South African journalist and reformer Ruth First and, like many autobiographies, it tends to be weepy.

Review

Molly's mother, with her protest activities and her journalism, doesn't have time for Molly. In one scene, she won't help Molly with her homework, but instead gives her money and tells her to run along.

Molly's dad, a communist, flees South Africa to escape the police. Weeks later, Molly's mother throws a party where Molly dances and drinks champagne until the police come and nearly arrest her mother for serving alcohol to blacks.

Later, Molly's mother is jailed under the 90-Day Detention Act, which allows police to jail anyone on a whim for 90 days without trial.

In prison, a woman guard who looks as if her name could be Hulga manhandles Molly's mother. Prisoners are forced to scrub floors with rags tied to their feet in a parody of the twist.

The film drags along, with scenes of Molly getting harassed by the girls at school and getting angry at her parents for leaving.

May's portrayal of the pristine, girl's-school-uniformed Molly is convincing and is one of the film's highlights.

While displaying the personal pain of blacks and whites caused by apartheid, however, "A World Apart" barely touches on apartheid itself.

Although the Union Program Council is billing the film as being "shown in accordance" with Tuesday's Lou Douglas Lecture by Nomonde Ngubo about the struggle for black liberation in South Africa, the film is not about apartheid. It is about a girl whose mummy and daddy aren't there for her.

Though the film is set in South Africa, it is not about South Africa. Molly's story could just as easily be the story of the daughter of either Carrie Nation or Molly Pitcher.

The film's strength is not its social commentary. Instead, its strength lies in its personalization of the pain caused by apartheid and its irony, as thick as an Afrikaner's accent.

The film's weaknesses are its melodrama — Molly at one point burns her mother's newsclippings and another time she says, "I don't have friends anymore" — and its pettiness.

Sometimes Molly seems like a poor little rich girl who is crying because her mother no longer applies make-up with her while the black cook's children are being killed by police. Her mother goes to prison but packs a suitcase. The idea of throwing parties hardly seems to be the best revolutionary act taken against apartheid.

In the end, mother and daughter realize they are the victims of apartheid, a system forcing everyone to hurt everyone else, including mothers and daughters.

Like all tragic films that aspire to be art, "A World Apart" ends on a persevering note. Molly resolves to do her duty as a Christian soldier and be firm in her pain.

It will be shown at 7:30 tonight in Forum Hall, at 3:30 p.m. Thursday in the Little Theatre and at 7:30 p.m. Thursday in Forum Hall.

Hayden to sign Legislature's bill for tax reduction

From Staff and Wire Reports

TOPEKA — Gov. Mike Hayden said he will sign a bill the Legislature approved Wednesday that would reduce individual income taxes by $69 million while providing $26 million in property tax relief for households hardest hit by statewide reappraisal.

Although the bill waters down the income tax relief that Hayden sought, he congratulated the Legislature, which has been at odds with him this session over the form the tax relief should take, for its work.

"The centerpiece of the legislation is my proposal to cut individual income taxes," Hayden said in a prepared statement. "The bill is a reasonable compromise."

The bill contains the two key elements of Hayden's tax proposals, income tax reductions and increased income tax rebates for school districts, Hayden noted. Other provisions added by a conference committee, including federal deductibility, also are acceptable, he said.

Hayden had wanted to reduce individual income taxes by $79 million. The Senate approved Hayden's proposal without change but the House rejected it. The House amended the bill to reduce income taxes by $53 million and add $50 million worth of property tax relief. The House amendments sent the bill into a conference committee, where the present version was ironed out.

The Senate passed the measure on a 38-1 vote, with Sen. Joe Harder, R-Moundridge, abstaining, while the House passed it 99-25.

"I'm pleased with the tax cut bill," said Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan. "It does provide what the Legislature wanted.

"It took a lot of work to get this bill through the Legislature," she said. "The Legislature will now know its budget and can be more prudent in its spending."

The bill is intended to stop collection of the windfall — additional revenue the state receives as a result of 1986 changes in the federal tax code.

"The governor promised to return the windfall, and the actions of both houses have allowed him to keep that commitment," said Senate President Bud Burke, R-Leawood.

Actually, the bill returns none of the windfall the state has collected the past two years. It simply stops collection of $79 million of it starting in the current tax year.

Oleen said the bill is a response to the feelings of Gov. Hayden and the Legislature about the collection of money the state had no right to

The commons area at Manhattan High School overflows with students after school. With more than 1,800 students, the school's teacher per student ratio is 1-to-30. Overcrowding here and in other local schools is a problem the Board of Education is trying to solve.

Committee reviewing problem

Recommendation on schools' overcrowding to be made

By Robert Short
Staff Writer

A 30-member core committee appointed by the Board of Education will have until May to come up with a solution to the problem of student overcrowding in the Manhattan-Ogden Unified School District 383.

Overcrowding in Manhattan High School and in several local elementary schools has been an ongoing problem for more than a year. The core committee, comprising parents, teachers, faculty, students and non-parent residents, will present a final recommendation to the board May 17.

The board decided last June it will accept only a recommendation regarding overcrowding that will provide the school district with more space for students and technology, said Lois Merriman, information director for the school district.

Neither year-round school nor an extended-day schedule will be considered by the board, she said.

The core committee has an operating budget of about $40,000, she said.

Hal Rowe, superintendent of schools, said it is "still too soon to say" what the core committee is considering as a solution to the overcrowding problem.

"Those ideas are going to come out in the community forums," Rowe said. The first such community forum is scheduled for Wednesday.

The recommendation to be presented to the board will deal specifically with overcrowded elementary schools in Manhattan and crowded classes at Manhattan High School. The core committee is conducting several open community forums to allow for community education and input from local residents.

A Columbus, Ohio, consulting firm, Planning Advocates, was hired by the board to work in conjunction with the core committee. James Rezac, principal of Manhattan High School, said the core committee will evaluate the school district to determine the most practical solution to the problem.

"The open community forums will work to gather data (for the final report)," Rezac said.

Planning Advocates was hired to "guide the board through the process of determining the need for additional space and equipment based on a critical look at program needs for the future and on population trends as precise as they may be able to determine them," according to a letter presented to the committee by Board President Barbara Withee.

The consulting firm also is responsible for organizing the core committee.

Bill Sanderson, teacher at Manhattan High School, said although the overall average class size for the high school is about 19, mainstream courses like government and history are approaching 35 in number.

Some teachers are relying on alternative teaching methods to handle the large class sizes, he said.

"A lot of the teachers are going to cooperative teaching techniques," Sanderson said.

These techniques divide the students into smaller groups according to their abilities, he said. The teacher is then able to move between the groups and devote more attention to the individual students.

Sanderson said the high school faculty as a whole is not pushing for any single solution to the overcrowding situation, only that one be found.

"Teachers will support any proposal that would lower the class size in the mainstream courses," Sanderson said.

With the high school population at about 1,800 students, Rezac said he does not foresee enrollment changing drastically in the next five years.

But beyond that, Rezac said, the numbers at the high school could increase by as many as 500 students, taking into consideration the current enrollment in the elementary schools.

Increasing the class size has been the immediate solution, but Rezac said it is potentially harmful to the academic environment if the classes become too large.

"Classes are getting pretty good sized," Rezac said. "We have 25 to 30 classes that have 30 or more students. The average is creeping toward 30.

"That is really larger than they ought to be. Thirty is too big — more kids than a teacher can deal with."

Rezac said his concern is for the teachers who are responsible for more than 150 students.

"That is a lot of homework," he said.

Manhattan residents could expect to see a new elementary school built every four to six years, taking into consideration the present rate of growth for the area, Rowe said in a report on overcrowding presented to the Board of Education last year.

Manhattan elementary schools were to reach capacity when classes began in fall 1988. Elementary school enrollment is expected to increase by 600 students in the next

Grant for mall expansion topic of public hearings

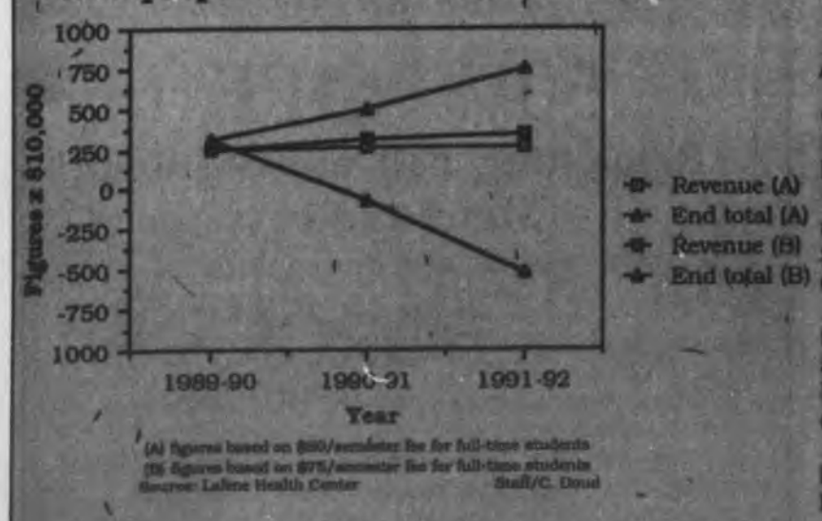
By Jodi Johnson
Collegian Reporter

The first of two public hearings was Wednesday evening at City Hall to discuss the application proposal for an Urban Development Action Grant for about $1.38 million for the expansion of the Manhattan Town Center.

UDAG is a federal program sponsored by the Department of Housing and Urban Development, and the funds from UDAG stimulate private investment in cities throughout the United States, said Karen Davis, assistant director of community development.

"Approximately $50 million has been set aside for these grants," Davis said. "Seventy-five percent of (the $50 million) is available for large cities, and 25 percent is available for cities the size of Manhattan, which we estimate to be about $13 million."

The application must be submitted to HUD's Washington, D.C., office by July 1. The negotiations for the project will be finalized by Aug. 1 in Washington, D.C.



The proposed grant could partially fund the expansion of the mall, which includes a 13,500-square-foot addition for specialty shops, a 65,000-square-foot space being negotiated by Sears, Roebuck and Co., and 450 additional parking spaces — with a total estimated cost of about $6.58 million.

Chris Heavey, manager of Manhattan Town Center, said if the application is accepted, the project's construction could begin in the spring of 1990 and completed by November 1990.

Benefits of the project include an increase of about $120,000 in sales tax revenues and an increase of about $105,000 in property tax revenues, Davis said. The additional property tax revenues will retire Tax Increment Financing bonds.

A benefit of $17,000 per year in land rent would be paid to the city of Manhattan by the mall developer. These funds will also be used for retirement of TIF bonds, she said.

Increase in health fee proposed

By Audra Dietz
Contributing Writer

The Student Health Advisory Committee will ask Student Senate for a $15 increase in the student health fee beginning next semester.

If the proposed increase is approved by Senate, the fee will be sent to a referendum vote of the student body.

The proposed increase is needed to cover the increasing cost of operating expenses at Lafene Student Health Center, said Dr. Robert Tout, director of Lafene.

"Without the increase, we will have to cut our services down to the level of services offered at a first-aid station," he said.

The cost of malpractice insurance is increasing faster than doctors' salaries, and Lafene is in danger of losing physicians, both Tout and Doug Oetinger, chairman of the Student Health Advisory Committee, said.

"These doctors want to stay in student health, but we can't continue not increasing their salaries and expect them to stay here," said Oetinger, senior in general business.

Lafene has employed nine physicians since 1985, and does not plan to hire any in the next two years, he said.

The rising cost of malpractice insurance is also making it difficult for Lafene to pay physicans competitive salaries, Tout said.

Insurance premiums are rising faster than salaries, he said. It will cost Lafene's doctors a total of $91,287 to buy insurance this year. The average Lafene physician takes home about $73,000 a year after insurance and benefits are deducted. In 1989, more than $10,000 for insurance will be deducted from each doctor's salary.

Tout said the health center, not the doctors, should absorb the insurance premium expense.

"My physicians can't take a cut in salary every year because of malpractice insurance costs," he said.

Student health fees cannot be used to pay malpractice insurance without approval from the state, Oetinger said. However, benefits such as social security and workers compensation are covered by the fee, he said.

A student health fee bill, which outlines a five-year plan to raise the health fee, will be submitted to Student Senate tonight.

Under the proposed bill, the current $60 fee would increase to $75 for full-time students beginning fall 1989. Full-time students would pay another $5 increase in fall 1991,

Iran offers bounty for author

Iran on Wednesday placed a $2.6 million bounty on the head of Salman Rushdie, whose novel "The Satanic Verses" has enraged the world's Moslems. Rushdie dropped from sight and canceled a U.S. promotional tour due to start Friday.

Police guarded Rushdie's home and his publishers.

"If the executioner is a foreigner he will receive a million dollars," said Hojatoleslam Hassan Saneie, head of the 15th Khordad Relief Agency, according to the Iranian news agency.

The reward for an Iranian, however, will be 200 million rials, or $2.6 million, the Islamic Republic News Agency quoted Saneie as saying.

Tehran Radio denounced the book as "a shameless onslaught on the sacred character of Islam's prophet" and protesters shattered windows at the British Embassy in Tehran.

The radio said Iran's ambassador to the Vatican, Salman Ghaffari, urged Pope John Paul II to "seriously oppose" the publication of the Italian translation of the book "and prove that he defends religion and spirituality."

Sea lions 5, Government 0

SEATTLE — Wildlife agents using a floating cage Wednesday tried to capture and deport sea lions that are devouring migrating salmon and trout on the Puget Sound, but the score so far is Sea Lions 5, Government 0.

Fisheries experts during the last five years have tried everything from rubber bullets to taped sounds of predatory whales to stop the huge mammals from depleting the fish runs.

The latest and sixth plan of attack is a floating cage, which was set just outside a ship canal to help wildlife agents remove the sea lions to a Navy base for tagging and then take them 250 miles to the Pacific Ocean.

By Wednesday afternoon, one sea lion had been caught.

"We're confident this plan is going to work," said Hal Alabaster of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

But not too confident.

"At the very least it'll be a good test of how long it takes them to get back," he said of the plan known officially at NOAA as Operation Goodbye. "Some are guessing they'll beat the trucks back."

In recent years, nets and steel barriers at the Ballard Locks, site of the fish ladder for fish returning to spawn, have led to failure.

After sea lions simply swam under and over the net, a lumber company put up a board that read "Sea Lions 4, Government 0," Alabaster said. "It was pretty embarrassing."

City officials delay gun ban

LOS ANGELES — The city agreed Wednesday to a one-week delay in its ban on possession of assault rifles while a federal judge decides whether he has jurisdiction in Colt Industries' lawsuit challenging the new law.

The city's ban on the sale of the rapid-fire weapons will remain in effect, however, while the lawsuit filed Monday by Colt Industries Inc. is considered.

The City Council on Feb. 7 banned the sale of semiautomatic weapons including Colt's AR-15, the AK-47 and the Uzi. The law also bars possession of such guns after Feb. 22 unless they have been modified so they cannot fire.

New York-based Colt, makers of the legendary Colt .45-caliber revolver and the AR-15 — a civilian version of the military's M-16 — contends in its lawsuit that the law will harm the company's finances and its image.

A court hearing was postponed Wednesday because of the jurisdiction issue.

"By making one of our firearms illegal by specifying in an ordinance that it's an apparently bad or unuseful weapon not (intended) for sporting is bad for our reputation," Colt attorney Harry G. Melkonian said after Wednesday's court session.

Actor's lover awarded damages

LOS ANGELES — Rock Hudson was guilty of "outrageous conduct" in concealing that he had AIDS from his homosexual lover, a jury ruled Wednesday in awarding the lover $14.5 million from the late actor's estate.

Marc Christian, 35, won $3.5 million more than he had sought in the case, regarded as a precedent-setting action and watched closely by lawyers. No similar case has had a like result when the plaintiff has not developed AIDS.

Hudson, the handsome Hollywood leading man who kept his homosexuality a secret from the public, died Oct. 5, 1985, at age 58, a few months after his battle with AIDS became public knowledge.

Christian, who smiled when the verdict was read, has consistently tested negative for the AIDS virus, but claimed he was entitled to compensation for the emotional distress he suffered in fear that he would develop the disease.

Logger has surgery in pickup

REW, Pa. — A logger who underwent surgery on the back of a pickup after being carried 1¼ miles to a clearing was listed in critical condition Wednesday.

Randall Crippen, 24, of Shinglehouse, suffered head and face injuries, said Dena Michaelson, spokeswoman at Hamot Medical Center in Erie.

Crippen was struck on the head by a five-inch limb of a falling tree Tuesday, according to officials at Bradford Hospital, where the logger was first taken.

Fire Chief Cliff Hastings said it took rescuers nearly four hours to get Crippen to Bradford, about 15 miles from a densely wooded mountain ridge.

About 50 volunteer firefighters, paramedics and other volunteers took turns carrying the injured man on a stretcher 1¼ miles to a clearing at the base of the ridge, where Dr. Glenn Irwin and paramedics were waiting, Hastings said.

Others carried bottled oxygen to Crippen, running in relays from a command post on the logging trail.

Irwin, medical director for advanced life support services at Bradford Hospital, said he performed a procedure, similar to a tracheotomy, that involved cutting a hole in the man's throat to open a passage in his windpipe.

The doctor worked on the back of a pickup with instruments he brought from the hospital. The operation took place at the end of a dirt logging trail.

Oscar nominations released

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. — "Rain Man," the Dustin Hoffman-Tom Cruise drama of a self-absorbed car dealer learning to love his autistic brother, took home eight Oscar nominations Wednesday, including best picture.

In collecting the most nominations for the 61st Academy Awards, the movie that overcame production obstacles also garnered a best-actor nomination for Hoffman and a directing honor for Barry Levinson.

Earning seven nominations each were "Dangerous Liaisons," a drama set in the bedrooms of the elite in pre-revolutionary France, and "Mississippi Burning," a controversial exploration of the FBI's handling of the 1964 murder of three civil rights activists.

Both were nominated for best picture, as were "The Accidental Tourist," an adaptation of Anne Tyler's novel about the heartbreaks and romances of a travel writer, and "Working Girl," a corporate Cinderella story about a secretary on Wall Street.

Sigourney Weaver claimed a rare double nomination for best actress for "Gorillas In The Mist: The Adventures of Dian Fossey" and best supporting actress as a shrewish executive in "Working Girl."

Joining Weaver in the best actress competition were Glenn Close, "Dangerous Liaisons"; Jodie Foster, "The Accused"; Meryl Streep, "A Cry In The Dark," and Melanie Griffith, "Working Girl." Streep, who won in 1979 for "Kramer vs. Kramer" and in 1982 for "Sophie's Choice," now has eight Oscar nominations in 15 roles.

Facing Hoffman in the best actor race will be Gene Hackman for "Mississippi Burning," Tom Hanks for "Big," Edward James Olmos for "Stand And Deliver," and Max Von Sydow for the Danish "Pelle The Conqueror."

Sailing club meeting tonight

The K-State Sailing Club will conduct an introductory recruitment meeting at 7 tonight in Union 204.

Cost to join the club is $20 per semester, said Richard Patterson, vice-commodore of the club, which has 20 active members.

Patterson said the membership fee pays for instruction in the use of boats as well as club functions. The sailing training provided by the club includes written and on-water training.

He said the club does "a lot of leisure sailing and is getting into intercollegiate sailing."

A sailing regatta this weekend at North Texas State University marks the first competition for the club this season. The competition is called a "fleet of lazers" in which 15-foot vessels with two-person crews will be used.

The club sails out of the Blue Valley Yacht Club and plans to conduct its own sailing meet in April.

Dean's Council created to promote cooperation

By Joe Kennedy
Collegian Reporter

Deans of the colleges of arts and sciences at the regents universities last week formed a council to promote further cooperation among the institutions.

The meeting was held at K-State and was attended by the arts and sciences deans from Emporia State University, Fort Hays State University, the University of Kansas, Pittsburg State University and The Wichita State University to form the first such council in Kansas, said Thomas Isenhour, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

"Our first goal will be to get to know each other," said James Muyskens, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences at KU. "Because we are all in the regents system we share many of the same aspirations and problems."

Promoting the arts and sciences colleges at all levels is the main objective of the council, Isenhour said. Other objectives include facilitating communications among the deans and assuming positions of leadership in matters that affect education in the state.

He said matters relating to the future of higher education and addressing problems of mutual concern — resource allocation, assessment, staffing, academic standards, retention and remedial education — are of particular interest to the council.

"Because we are all in the regents system we share many of the same aspirations and problems."
—James Muyskens, Kansas dean

Deans of arts and sciences from private and community colleges in Kansas may be invited to participate in meetings which are particularly designed to address philosophical issues rather than programmatic issues, Isenhour said.

All college students are required to take a basic curriculum of courses in arts and sciences; therefore, the common problems facing arts and sciences are much greater than the reasons for competition among the institutions, he said.

"We'd like to be seen as advocates in the state for liberal arts and recognized by the Board of Regents as such," Muyskens said.

Kendall Blanchard, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences at Emporia State University, will serve as executive secretary for this year, Isenhour said. His responsibilities will include organizing the group, coordinating the agenda, and bringing the group together.

He said the council will meet again in July at KU and in October at Wichita State.

Senate to consider health fee

By Darren Keller
Collegian Reporter

Student Senate will have the first reading Thursday of a bill to raise next year's student health fee from $60 to $75 for full-time students.

The money would increase the budget for Lafene Student Health Center, which is not expected to balance its expenses with expected income in fiscal year 1990.

"If Senate doesn't pass this bill, I don't know what Lafene will have to do to maintain its operation costs," said Todd Johnson, Student Senate chairman.

Measures have been instituted to decrease expenditures at Lafene, however, health care costs have risen dramatically. Lafene would like to initiate a three- to five-year plan to balance income with expenses.

If the bill is passed, part-time students will have a $25 fee and the fee for students enrolled in summer courses would increase from $4 to $5.

The bill is not scheduled for Senate debate until Thursday, Feb. 23.

Senate will vote on a bill to raise the Student Government Association printing budget. SGA discovered a deficit in its printing budget, and the money spent for printing did not decrease, as anticipated for the 1988-89 year.

"If Senate doesn't pass this bill, I don't know what Lafene will have to do to maintain its operation costs."
—Todd Johnson, Senate chairman

Johnson said the increase is needed to keep up with the costs of the recently purchased copy machine.

He said $250 of this budget goes to copying and sending letters to high school seniors who request information about student government at K-State.

"We would like to put ($250) into the SGA budget instead of asking for a special allocation," he said.

Another SGA bill up for vote is the allocation of $85 to the Consumer Relations Board for purchase of a reference book entitled, "Consumer Protection and the Law."

Senate will also vote on the appointments to the Student Tribunal and Student Review Board. Attorney General Mike Kadel and personnel selection coordinator Ira Bolden have chosen the appointees with exception of Intrafraternity Council, Panhellenic Council and residence hall appointees who were selected by each respective organization.

A special allocation for a trip to Washington D.C., combining SGA reserve accounts and campaign expenditure regulations, will also be read and discussed.

North's trial to proceed; Material guidelines set

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Oliver North's Iran-Contra trial appeared to get back on track Wednesday as prosecutors, after meeting with Justice Department lawyers, issued guidelines designed to guard against disclosures of classified material by North.

In a four-paragraph statement, independent counsel Lawrence Walsh said he will, if necessary, seek an affidavit from Attorney General Dick Thornburgh to prevent the disclosure of classified information which could harm national security.

The statement was worked out with Thornburgh, who said it will permit national security secrets to be protected.

Hours after the announcement, Thornburgh asked the Supreme Court to lift the stay that has delayed the start of the trial and said he will also drop his appeal of rulings by U.S. District Court Judge Gerhard A. Gesell on secrecy issues. Chief Justice William Rehnquist had issued the administrative stay at the Justice Department's request.

Walsh's statement was in response to an order issued Tuesday by Gesell, who told Thornburgh to stay out of the North case, barring the attorney general from filing affidavits in "bits and pieces" in response to individual documents or testimony planned by North. Gesell said Walsh "will be recognized as responsible for the day-to-day conduct of this case."

North's attorney, Brendan Sullivan, was not immediately available for comment.

Thornburgh, in a statement, endorsed the plan. "The independent counsel's planned implementation of yesterday's district court order provides the government with the substance of what we have been seeking for the past week."

"I am pleased that a mechanism has been developed that will permit the trial to go forward while ensuring that I can fulfill the responsibility imposed upon me by the Congress to protect the national security interests of the United States," Thornburgh said.

Walsh's statement also says Walsh will notify Thornburgh if evidence in any of eight specific categories is to be introduced.

At-risk programs receive funds

By Chris Koger
Staff Writer

Two elementary schools will receive funds, in addition to other schools already scheduled for funding, to improve the schools' abilities to successfully help at-risk students.

The decision made Wednesday night at the Manhattan School Board meeting will allow Lee and Roosevelt elementary schools to hire teacher aides and staff members and to develop curriculum enhancements for at-risk students.

At-risk students are those who experience problems at school due to social or economic problems at home or have a low self-esteem, said Penny Sturr, a teacher at Lee School.

The $10,200 allotted to Lee School will be used to establish working relationships between teachers and parents and allow teachers to promote critical thinking and cooperative learning by obtaining necessary resources and materials from the library.

The school employs a social worker who acts as a counselor. At-risk funds will used to fund the position.

"The problems some of our students face aren't just social or economic, but academic," Sturr said. "The social worker has been invaluable as a liaison between the teachers, children and parents.

"Often students feel isolated from other students because of transitional factors ... like a divorce in the family or moving during the school year."

The board allotted about $11,000 to Roosevelt School for proposed at-risk programs. Roosevelt plans to hire a full-time certified teacher to assist the classroom instructors.

According to the proposal, poor academic achievement is not the only factor contributing to the profile of a student at risk. The proposal recommends a part-time staff counselor be hired to work with individual students or small groups.

The proposal said a K-State graduate assistant majoring in elementary counseling or family and child development studies may be able to fill this position, but the board made no final decision on the recommendation.

In other business, the board approved new course proposals, including the adoption of a computer guide for kindergarten through sixth grades.

Superintendent Hal Rowe said he encourages students to learn about computers.

"Kids are coming to school knowing about computers, and they're not getting this knowledge in school," Rowe said.

The board discussed the Sunset Zoo's parking lot improvements considered by the City Commission. The commission may resurface and enlarge the lot and allow 25 percent of the 125 parking spaces for high school students.

The proposed improvements would cost $120,000, and, if the board decides to let students use the lot, the district will pay $1,500 a year for 10 years.

Rowe said the school would not be purchasing part of the lot, but renting it.

Roger Reitz was the only board member who disapproved of using the lot.

"I don't think we need it, and it's too far (from the school)," he said.

The City Commission will decide if the lot will be improved during its Wednesday meeting at City Hall.

Quality medical care worth increased fees

So far this year we've heard about unity and growth, a proposed athletic fee, divestment from South Africa, poor funding of Farrell Library, and now the possibility of an increase in the student fee which supports Lafene Student Health Center.

The stories of underfunded departments, colleges and campus organizations are old. Everybody wants more money, and when the administration says no, the buck is passed to Student Senate.

Last year Senate came through on the Child Development Center issue, footing the bill the administration decided it couldn't. This year, Senate will discuss the athletic and Lafene fee proposals, and students may well have to determine their priorities.

Health care is basic to any community, and a health care center is intrinsic to the welfare of any large university. Many students cannot afford the costs of medical treatment, and a health center on campus charging lower rates is not only a beneficial service, it is also a necessity.

Lafene and other health care facilities throughout the state are suffering from an exodus of doctors because of the recent Kansas Supreme Court decision that resulted in an increase of the price of malpractice insurance for medical doctors, said Larry Moeller, chief of staff at Lafene.

Although Lafene's physicians fall under the lowest of eight risk categories determining these rates, the costs are exorbitant compared with present salaries. Moeller said there is a supplement to the doctors' salaries to cover malpractrice insurance, but it is always a year behind the actual costs.

Last year, Lafene had about 60,000 clinical visits, nearly 33,000 of which received treatment from physicians. Although not every student uses Lafene, the figures demonstrate that there is a considerable number who do.

In order to maintain a license to practice in Kansas, physicians must pay a malpractice insurance and stabilization fund surcharge of $10,143, Moeller said. Seven physicians and one psychiatrist on Lafene's staff must pay this rate. A nurse practitioner and physician's assistant pay insurance on a lower scale.

The problem is simple. To maintain adequate medical service at Lafene, the University must in some way cover the costs of malpractice insurance, and retain what few doctors it has. If the administration cannot find the funds to cover such a venture, it will be left up to Senate to make a decision.

It is critical students voice their opinions on this issue to determine how much of a priority quality medical treatment is to this campus.

Alcohol sponsorship not welcome in parks

No good deed goes unpunished.

Campbell Distributors, the local purveyor of Anheuser-Busch products, did a good deed. The company purchased dugout covers for a city park. The covers, not surprisingly, read "Budweiser" and "Bud Light." Like any business, Campbell took the opportunity of a good deed to publicize itself and its products.

Normally, nobody complains when companies sponsor little league teams and put the company names on the uniforms. Nor do they complain when corporations present big checks with six or seven zeros on them during charity drives and telethons.

But this is not the case with the dugout covers. In fact, there is a move to have the dugout covers removed entirely.

Why? It would seem there is an ordinance which prevents the advertisement of tobacco, drugs and alcoholic beverages in city parks. And the charge is being made that the dugout covers constitute advertising.

Those in opposition to keeping the covers, like most "just say no" campaigners, seem more concerned with appearances than realities.

If they really wish to get things which promote alcohol removed, why don't they get the city ordinance taken off the books which allows those under 21 into bars in Manhattan? Those under 21 might be less likely to say yes if they weren't in a bar.

This ordinance was passed by the City Commission because of the large 18- to 21-year-old population in the city. During debate on the ordinance, commissioners simply asked, "Where are we going to put them if we don't put them in the bars?"

Apparently, it was a rhetorical question.

These things seem not to have occurred to those who would remove the dugout covers. If the covers do constitute advertising, it seems a drop in the bucket compared with all of the advertising on television, radio and in magazines and newspapers.

If stopping alcohol abuse is their aim, it might be best if they left the good deeds unpunished.

Self-starvation serious problem

I stare at mirrored store reflections, the shadows that follow me,
and see a bulging image.
Models on Vogue or Cosmopolitan never face such knifing penetration.
I close my eyes,
one, two, three, no...
the ribs lashing out from my waist assure me that I'm almost there.
But in the air,
the smell of apple pie covers
my nose, my dry lips, fattening my body
with a poisonous desire.

Eating disorders are something we know exist, but usually they're thought of as treatable and curable.

However, sometimes a woman with an eating disorder is also harshly described as some spoiled, little girl trying to get attention by starving herself.

Coming from a theater perspective, I have always thought anorexia nervosa would make an excellent, thought-provoking play.

I was fascinated by the fact that a healthy, young woman could suddenly start compulsively dieting and starve herself to the point of death.

Because I was also a fan of singer Karen Carpenter, anorexia nervosa intrigued me more. After all, she had talent, an excellent voice and seemingly everything going for her. Despite this, she started starving herself until it lead to physical problems which caused her death.

So I began reading about anorexia nervosa. What I found was that victims of anorexia nervosa live in a very serious and frightening world with everlasting implications.

In the book "The Best Little Girl In The World," by Steve Levenkron, the main character, Francesca, could have been any female we know. She gets good grades, never gets angry or hostile, and does everything that's expected of her.

In cliche terms, she's the girl next door. But Francesca doesn't like herself. She hates being dumped on by her family and friends. She wants control of her life.

Food becomes a scapegoat for the lack of control she feels she doesn't have in her life. Therefore, she can control her eating, her weight, and her body.

What's very frightening about Francesca's dieting is that it loses all sense of logic as well as the control she's looking for when she begins dieting.

There's a point where she commits a mental suicide of the fat, pitiful Francesca, and becomes Kessa, a slender, slick, flawless woman like the models on the magazine covers.

What Francesca doesn't realize, like many women, is that pictures can be plasticized and blown out of proportion until a model looks flawless and perfect.

As with Francesca, another common factor that seems to occur with anorexia nervosa victims is trouble with family and friendship relationships.

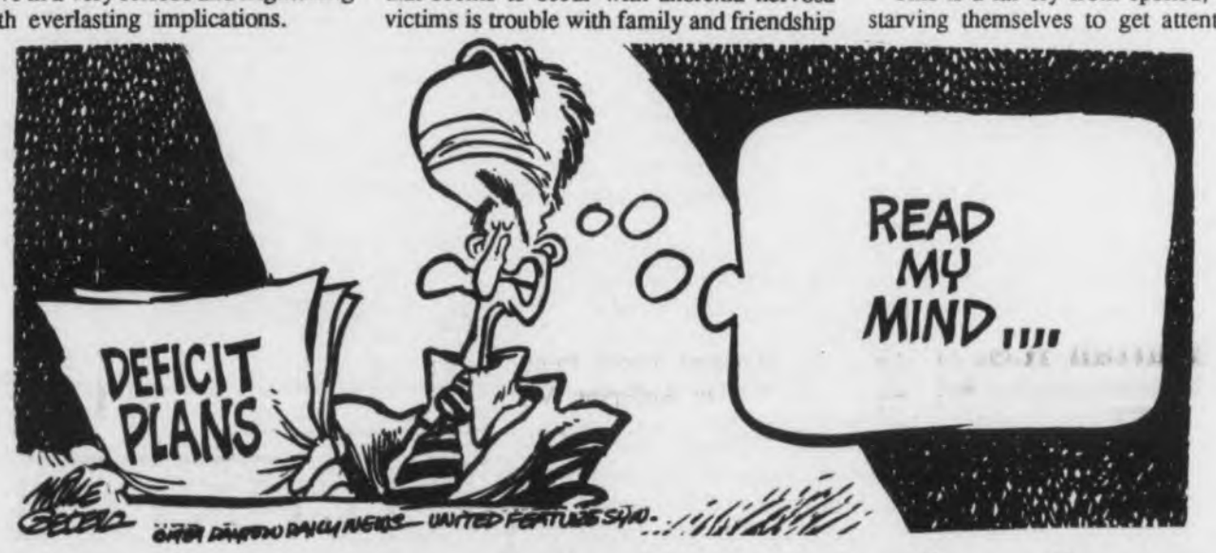
Maybe it's because women are socialized to be sustainers of relationships. If a relationship doesn't work, a woman starts to feel guilty, blame herself and feel out of control.

By losing weight, Francesca found that people noticed her. She became important. People wanted to know what she was thinking and feeling.

This says a lot about taking a person seriously, especially in the case of women. It's sad to think that a woman has to become emaciated and near death before she is listened to or noticed.

For Karen Carpenter, the seeds of anorexia nervosa began with a critic's review in Billboard magazine that labeled her as the "chubby sister" next to the slender, handsome brother.

One of the saddest and most provoking moments in the movie version of Karen Carpenter's life was when she passed an elevator and saw a distorted reflection of herself.



She just stared at the reflection. To her, it wasn't a distorted image but an actual perception of how she thought she looked, although she was already underweight.

Victims of anorexia nervosa live in nightmares. They think constantly about food, hoard food, and examine their underweight bodies for fat which they always find.

There can also be self-induced vomiting and the use of laxatives to supposedly clean out the fat and waste in the body.

In one case history I read, a woman would chop up her food in tiny pieces and then use her fork to tap out a beat against her plate. The beat reminded her to stay in control, to stay thin and to stay beautiful.

This is a far cry from spoiled, little girls starving themselves to get attention.

Democracy rears ugly head

Commentary

Kale Baldock
Contributing Columnist

The Feb. 4 overthrow of President Alfredo Stroessner in Paraguay ended the dictator's uninterrupted rule of 35 years. Whether the new president, Areas Rodriguez, will bring about the genuine democracy he promises remains to be seen. If democracy does come to Paraguay, though, it will certainly be a signal to Washington that U.S. policy in this country is out of control.

Stroessner served U.S. policy well. The Paraguayan population was kept in check politically and economically, paving the way for elite control and foreign investment. Strategic concerns were well in hand as long as the staunchly pro-American government and its military maintained power.

The 1987 book "The U.N. Commission on Human Rights," by Howard Tolley Jr., describes a number of disturbing events which transpired in Paraguay under Stroessner, including two references to "the massacre and enslavement of tribal Indians."

Under Stroessner, "Political dissidents in ... Paraguay ... disappeared by the thousands, and their families continue to search in vain."

The government of Paraguay was charged with "forcing workers to labor under slave conditions."

The book makes a very interesting and revealing statement when discussing "pro-Western governments" which are guilty of human rights abuses, including Turkey, South Korea, the Philippines, and Paraguay as well as "anti-Western governments" which are guilty of human rights abuses including Ethiopia, Afghanistan, and East Germany.

The "anti-Western governments" are labeled "totalitarian, Marxist states," whereas the "pro-Western governments" are labeled "right-wing."

Right-wing? Excuse me, but Ronald Reagan, Pat Buchanan and William F. Buckley Jr. are right-wing, and as much as they delight over allied regimes like Stroessner's, they have not succeeded in carrying out the torture and murder of U.S. citizens who oppose them politically.

A few exceptions for Reagan include Ben Linder, murdered by the "freedom fighters" in Nicaragua; and four American nuns, tortured, raped and murdered by the "anti-communists" in El Salvador. But let's not be too hard on the guy. He had to go to the trouble of using proxy forces in foreign lands to get these enemies of democracy.

I don't know the author's political philosophy, and his language may not intend any bias, but the fact that Tolley uses a potentially benign term like "right-wing" to describe what in other instances he labels "totalitarian" not only suggests a conservative bias, but also reflects a typical hesitancy to denounce U.S.-supported regimes, however repugnant they may be.

As chief of the Paraguayan Armed Forces, Stroessner overthrew the government of Frederico Chavez in 1954 and installed "an interim government composed of his own friends" and conducted "his own elections as president in July after a vote in which he was the only candidate," according to "Political Leaders of Latin America" by Richard Bourne.

Such was to be the case for nearly 35 years, during which time Stroessner was "re-elected" seven more times by almost certain massive fraud.

Stroessner's regime kept a tight clamp not only on most political dissent, but also on forums of public discourse in general.

Bourne reports in 1969 that while a little political dissent might be tolerated, "Journalists find themselves in prison and paper sellers risk being beaten up."

Stroessner himself had some very insightful ideas on the press: "I feel that the written and spoken word should not have any other aim but good ... because if we believe in God and therefore believe ourselves to be servants of God we must always abstain from sowing the seed of evil in the spiritual furrows of the people and of humanity."

A very noble philosophy: Don't say anything bad about me or my government — that would be against God.

Like most other dictators in Latin America and elsewhere, Stroessner thrived off of rabid anti-communism. All he had to do was mention the word "communism" and U.S. military aid began to flow.

In Stroessner's Paraguay, the "For the Defense of Democracy" law of October 1955 vowed punishment for those "who rise up with armed force against constituted authority ... by the communist or any other totalitarian regime," as well as for those "who spread the Communist doctrine ... to destroy or change the democratic, republican organization of the nation by violence."

It may be argued that any government has a right to protect itself. But, as Bourne notes, "The regime defined 'communism' as it chose," which led to everything from the repression and breaking up of labor unions in 1958 to the torturing to death of "six young men, all but one members of a communist youth group" in 1965.

More recently, reports the May 10, 1988, issue of The Economist magazine, Stroessner's police took to breaking up protests, rallies and even "a meeting of law students and a journalist's seminar" by means of electric cattle prods and tear gas. One law student's body was found with a bullet wound and "marks of torture."

As though ignorant of the historical context, The Economist mentions without comment that "The Americans, who worry that more repression could open the way for another Nicaragua-like revolution, are pressing for reform."

Just what is it that Americans fear about "another Nicaragua-like revolution" happening in Paraguay? I'm prompted to think back a few years when the Reagan administration, pretending to be gravely concerned about the human rights of Nicaraguans living under the Sandinistas, threatened to invade that country and topple its evil regime.

Their true motivation, however, was more likely outrage over the Sandinistas' refusal to bow to the United States' self-proclaimed sovereignty over the hemisphere, and embarrassment at the fact that the Sandinistas were providing their people with health care, education and land without dependence on U.S. aid or consent.

In the cases of El Salvador and Guatemala, not only was there never any overture made about invading these countries to liberate the people, the Reagan administration graciously supplied the training and military hardware necessary to torture and murder tens of thousands.

As for Stroessner's Paraguay, the United States seems to have been content with the regime's victims of such crimes numbering maybe only in the thousands. The job got done. The traditional order was kept.

Where now? Back to the good ol' days of security through God's inspired authority? Or is democracy about to rear its ugly head?

Gunman kills 3, himself

By The Associated Press

BETHESDA, Md. — A gunman opened fire in an office building today, killing three people and wounding one before killing himself, Montgomery County police said.

Police Capt. Richard Williams said the man emerged from an elevator and opened fire. After killing three people, he turned his gun on himself, Williams said.

The shootings occurred at the credit card department offices of Chevy Chase Federal Savings Bank in this Washington, D.C., suburb.

The gunman appeared to be a "disgruntled employee," according to another police spokesman, Officer George Luddington.

The identities of the victims were not known immediately.

Hillary Murphy, spokeswoman for Suburban Hospital, said a 30-year-old man was listed in critical condition with a gunshot wound to the face.

Alex Chapin, of Atlanta, who was on the telephone with a bank employee when the shootings occurred, told WUSA, a Washington television station:

"I heard the gunshots and I heard a woman screaming in the background and I heard a guy say 'I'm hit, I'm hit' and another person say 'quick, get some towels'.

"I hear a banging at the door and ... I heard somebody say, 'don't let him in, don't let him in.' And then ... I hear another scream and I hear another shot and I'm like, 'Oh my God, what is going on up there?'

"Out of horror, I'm sitting here listening to the phone, cause I don't know if it's a hostage situation going on or what."

Copy center installed in Farrell

By Paige Gantz
Collegian Reporter

Farrell Library patrons who are tired of searching for a working copy machine may have had their prayers answered with the installation of a self-service copy center on the second floor.

"The center is open during regular hours, with five coin-operated, six Copicard, and four auditron-operated machines available," said Virginia Quiring, associate dean of library development. "With 11 machines available, there should be no waiting."

The consolidation of the copiers on the second floor should improve service for patrons, she said.

Shelly Wittwer, head of the reserves department, will also be in charge of the copy center.

No longer will patrons have to search for a working machine.

"It was not uncommon for the machines to be out of working order," Wittwer said. "If patrons were clear up on third floor and discovered this, then they would have to run back down to the first floor and try to find someone to fix it.

"The same happened when the copier ran out of paper. It was up to the patron to report it to first floor so more paper could be filled into the machine."

Coin-op copies are five cents per page copied. The copiers take nickels, dimes or quarters. Change is available from the change machine located outside the copy center.

"We also have pre-programmed copy cards that look like a credit card," Wittwer said. "A $5 card will furnish 92 copies and a $10 card will produce 184 copies."

The card is inserted in the copier and each time a copy is made, it is automatically deducted from the card, Wittwer said. These cards can be used in the machines that have a reduction feature which, "allows users to put two pages on one copy which reduces the overall expense."

The newest service available is the auditrons, Wittwer said. Auditrons are "checked out" with a student ID and inserted in the machines like a cartridge. The auditrons count the number of copies made, for which the patron pays a cashier five cents per copy. Auditrons work in copiers that have both enlargement and reduction capabilities.

The copy center is staffed with one student assistant, Wittwer said. The assistant will refill machines with paper, clear jams, provide users with information on how the machines operate and place service calls as needed.

AIDS virus enzyme identifed, may help develop new drugs

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Scientists say they have determined the three-dimensional structure of an enzyme the AIDS virus needs to spread its infection, a step that could lead to new AIDS drugs.

An enzyme is a protein that initiates or speeds up a chemical reaction. The findings, published in Thursday's issue of the British journal Nature, are the first report on the three-dimensional structure of any protein of the virus.

The discovery will help researchers develop drugs to block the enzyme and keep the AIDS virus from spreading, said Manuel Navia, who, with eight other scientists from the Merck Sharp and Dohme Research Laboratories in Rahway, N.J., and West Point, Pa., reported the findings.

"It's pretty dramatic," said AIDS researcher Jay Levy of the University of California at San Francisco.

William Haseltine of the Dana-Farber Cancer Institute in Boston called the finding "an important and critical step along the pathway to rational, anti-AIDS drug development."

> "It's pretty dramatic."
> —Jay Levy
> AIDS researcher

The enzyme, which looks like a tangled string in the general shape of an angelfish, is called an aspartal protease, and it comes into play as the AIDS virus makes copies of itself.

To reproduce, the virus infects a cell and hijacks the cell's protein-making machinery. It then orders the machinery to produce proteins, including the aspartal protease, for assembling new viruses.

The proteins are manufactured in a string, like cars on a train. But the proteins, which new viruses need to infect other cells, will not work unless they are separated. The newly analyzed enzyme is responsible for cutting the proteins apart.

If a drug can be found to inhibit the enzyme's function, it could stop the spread of infection, Navia said.

Haseltine said such a drug should also keep an infected person from being infectious to others. Researchers would have to make sure that the drug would not block similar enzymes elsewhere in a person's body, Levy said.

As of Monday, the federal Centers for Disease Control had counted a cumulative total of 86,157 AIDS cases in the nation, with 49,390 deaths.

Sri Lanka election results in deaths

By The Associated Press

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka — Terrorists killed at least 56 people Wednesday during the first parliamentary elections in 11 years, police reported.

One victim was a Cabinet minister's son. Another was a cyclist seen lying dead in the road, shot from a passing car minutes after he voted.

Extremist gangs attacked election officials and assaulted several polling places with bombs and gunfire, wounding at least 20 people, authorities reported.

The government announced a nationwide overnight curfew beginning at 9 p.m. "in order to assist security forces to implement law and order."

Election officials said about 65 percent of the 9.3 million eligible voters cast ballots despite the violence and threats of intimidation from Sinhalese and Tamil extremists. Only 55 percent voted in the presidential election in December.

Nine political parties and 10 independent groups competed for the 225 seats in the new Parliament. Results were expected Thursday.

Police blamed terrorists of the Sinhalese majority for 47 killings, including that of Jayantha Mallimarachichi, whose jeep was ambushed in a Colombo suburb. His father Weerasinghe is fuel minister.

Officials said police killed seven Sinhalese who attacked polling stations and two people were reported killed by Tamil terrorists in northern Sri Lanka, stronghold of the ethnic minority.

Sinhalese extremists began an anti-government campaign in July 1987 and opposing the elections was part of it.

They say the government has given too much to Tamil rebels.

Radios shrink globe

Club members communicate worldwide

By Joe Kennedy
Collegian Reporter

The chance to talk with a person anywhere in the world is an opportunity not everyone has a chance to experience; however, students in the amateur radio club have worldwide communication access.

The short-wave radio uses the equipment at different frequency bands, said David Yoder, treasurer of the amateur radio club.

The club's station, located on the fourth floor of Seaton Hall, was established in 1927 and specializes in high frequency or short-wave communication, Yoder said.

"With broadcast radio, a station is assigned one frequency that uses one transmitter and one antenna," he said. "In amateur radio, (the operators) have a lot of bands or groups of frequencies to work with. There is hardly any other radio service that can do that except for maybe some military stations."

Radio conversation must be on personal topics because business conversation is against the law, Yoder said.

"Conversations generally consist of exchange of names and addresses, discussing the area you're from, what type of equipment you are using, your hometown and the weather," he said.

Yoder has contacted every state in the United States, every continent and 139 countries.

"I contacted a government research facility at the South Pole," he said. "It was 75 degrees below zero, and they were telling me about how they initiated the new guys that arrived at the facility. They called the initiation the '300 Club' because they would put them in a sauna for a period of time and then make them run naked to a point in the yard and back to the building. The temperature change was supposed to be about 300 degrees."

"It's amazing the number of people who speak English," Yoder said. "Throughout all of my contacts, I have spoken nothing but English. I even spoke to a (Soviet) who spoke English."

Contacts can develop into friends if spoken to on a regular basis, said Mike Culver, senior in mechanical engineering and former president of the club.

Culver said he contacted a woman from New Zealand who owned a large cattle and sheep ranch. After their conversation through the radio, they became pen pals and have written each other for 1½ years.

Culver talked to a man from Hawaii who lives 1½ miles from an active volcano.

"(The Hawaiian) lived in a solar house and had to bring fuel up on his back to run the generator (which) he used to power his equipment," he said. "While we were talking, he described a lava flow that was going by his house and into the ocean."

The club has six active members who pay $8 for dues, which finance equipment for the station, Yoder said.

Each member must have a license to get a key to the station. A licensed amateur is able to join the club and the station is accessible to members 24 hours a day, he said.

The members are licensed by the Federal Communications Commission, Yoder said. Licenses are awarded on five levels, which are novice, technician, general, advanced and amateur extra, with each level providing additional frequency choices for the user.

"Each level is supposed to induce learning more about the radio and its uses," he said.

A test must be taken to acquire each license level.

Union shuttle service 'successful'

By Darren Keller
Collegian Reporter

The K-State Union Express, a shuttle service provided by the Union to and from Bramlage Coliseum for men's basketball games, has been a success since it started in November.

Vera Carr, associate director of the Union and coordinator of the Express, said about 200 people per game have used the shuttle service.

"It has been a real success so far," she said. "When the basketball games used to be at Ahearn, people would park at the Union to meet their friends and have a snack before the game."

Because the games are now played at the coliseum, people cannot park at the Union and walk across the street to the game like they were accustomed to, Carr said. The Express allows them to continue the tradition as long as they purchase $1 worth of merchandise from the Union.

"When you buy $1 worth of food from the cafeteria or an item from the bookstore (on game days), you will receive a ticket for the shuttle," she said. "You must have a ticket to ride the shuttle to the coliseum and save the ticket for the ride back to the Union."

She said no profit is made from the $1 purchase requirement.

"It just allows us to pay for the buses," she said. "We are doing it as a service to the campus and the community."

Three school buses are rented for $100 apiece, she said. A fourth bus is rented for $65 to transport people from the coliseum back to the Union.

Bob Sultzer, Union building manager, is in charge of making room for the buses to park in front of the south entrance of the Union.

"We block off the area at about 5 p.m. on game nights," he said. "We usually try to have a student out there to ask people not to park there. Sometimes people still (park there) and it causes some problems, but it's been pretty smooth so far."

The Express starts running one hour before the game and continues until 30 minutes after the start of the game. One hour before the end of the game, the shuttle starts bringing people back to the Union.

Charles Beckom, K-State Police chief, said the buses deliver the passengers at curbside in front of the coliseum and are usually ready before the game ends to transport people back to the Union.

"The only problem we've had so far is unavoidable," he said. "When the second series of buses come in after the game is over, they have to fight traffic leaving the game."

Carr said the shuttle service was used for a few women's games last semester but only two people showed up to use the service.

WE'RE LOOKING FOR GOOD TEACHERS

And we're willing to pay to get them

For highly qualified applicants willing to commit to teach in our schools for two or three years, we'll pay all or some of your tuition for the final year of undergraduate or graduate school.

We're especially interested in you if you plan to teach, at any level from pre-K through 12th grade, Math, Science, Reading, French, Spanish or German.

We offer a wide array of teaching opportunities, from elementary schools specializing in Language Immersion, Arts, Computers, Math/Science, Environmental Sciences, Montessori or Latin Grammar to high schools specializing in Computers, Math/Science, Law and Public Service, Arts, Engineering or, in the near future, Agribusiness, International Studies and Communications.

If you're a good teacher, we'll have a place where you can make a difference.

'Cats win, 87-79; Lady Cats fall, 87-71

Dobbins sparks victory

From Staff and Wire Reports

BOULDER, Colo. — Wildcat center Fred McCoy and guard Steve Henson put together a 5-0 run and forward Mark Dobbins scored a career-high 15 points as K-State edged Colorado, 87-79, in Big Eight Conference play Wednesday night.

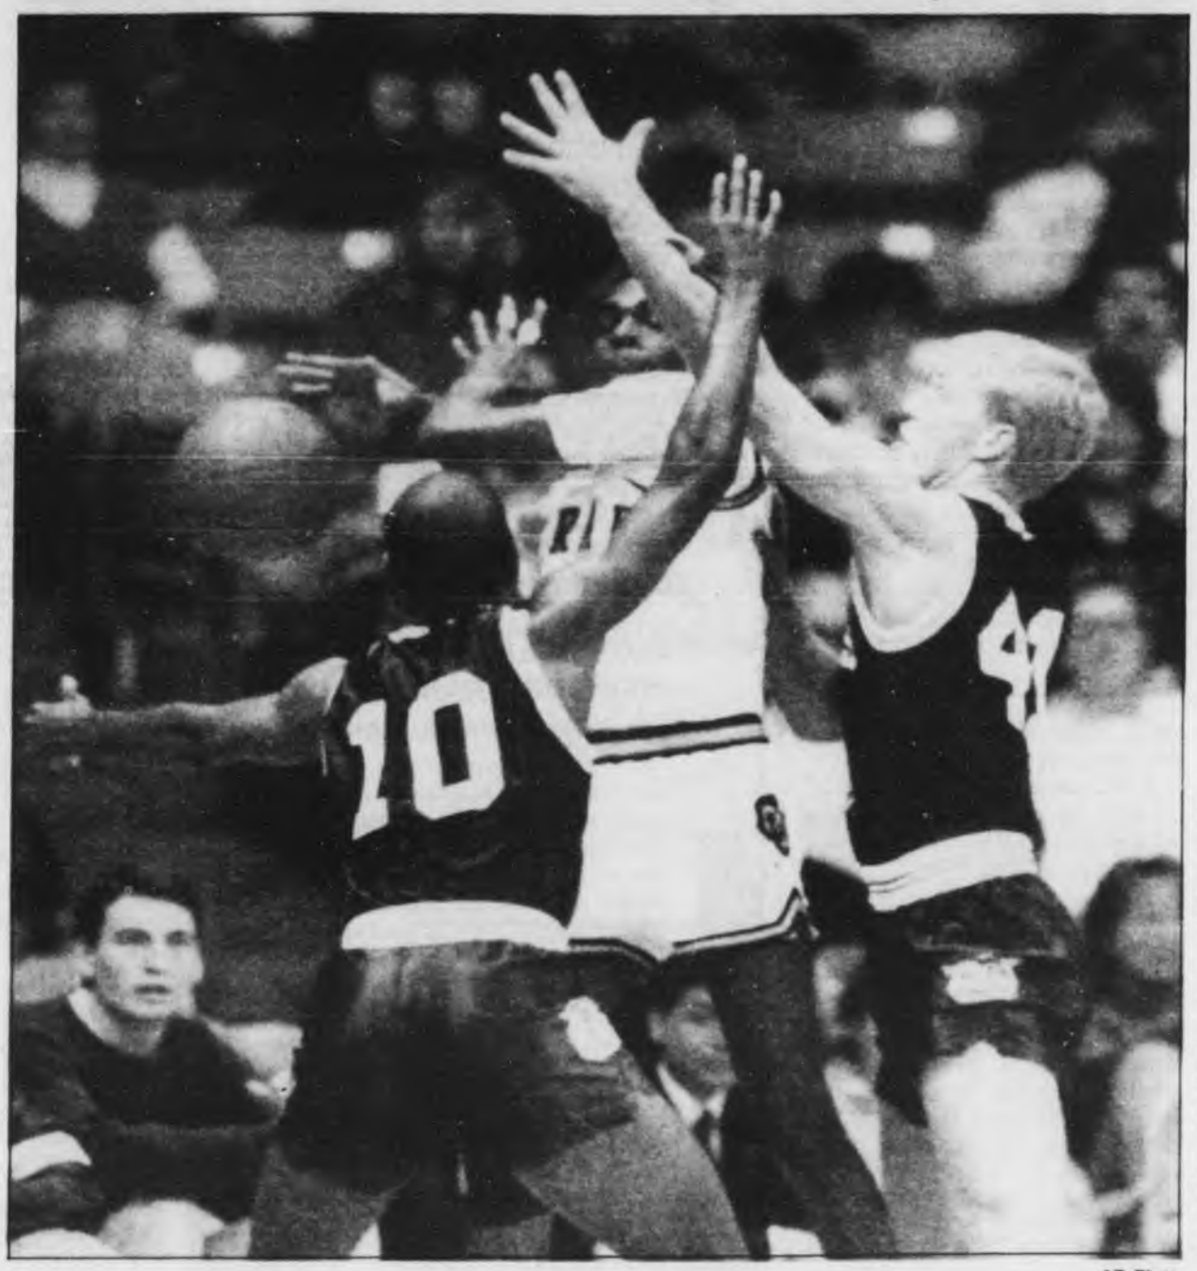
"I was really proud of the way we hung in there late (Wednesday)," Wildcat coach Lon Kruger said. "You know, we lost an 11-point lead or most of it, but were still able to hold on down the stretch."

The Buffaloes were trailing by one point with 2:07 to go when McCoy, who finished with 19 points, scored three points and Henson, who finished with 23, added two to make it 81-75 with 48 seconds left.

The Wildcats added six free throws to close out their scoring and raise their record to 15-7 overall and 6-4 in the conference. Colorado dropped to 7-15 overall and 2-7 in the league.

Shaun Vandiver, who led Colorado in scoring with 23, and Steve Wise added last-minute baskets for the Buffs. Reggie Morton added another 21 points for Colorado.

The Wildcats led 44-37 at the half and maintained a lead until the Buffs started closing in at the end.



Morton hit the opening shot of the game, a 3-pointer, for the Buffs' only lead of the night.

K-State led 21-15 halfway through the first half, after collecting 13 points from Henson, including a trio of 3-pointers.

A shot by Morton brought Colorado to within 21-19 at 9:43 before a 9-4 run by K-State moved the Wildcats out, 30-23.

The Wildcats' biggest leads were nine points in the first half and 11 in the second.

It was a night where K-State definitely needed someone to step in and pick up the scoring slack with LaKeith Humphrey, the 'Cats third leading scorer, being kept to just three points. And it was Dobbins who came to the rescue.

Lady Buffs snare first Big 8 title

From Staff and Wire Reports

BOULDER, Colo. — Riding high on a five-game winning streak and sitting all alone in second place of the Big Eight Conference standings, the Lady Cats' post season chances were looking pretty good two weeks ago.

But after No. 15 Colorado handed the Lady Cats their third straight loss, 87-71, Wednesday night at the CU Events and Conference Center, a bit of a shadow has now been cast on any hopes of K-State's being invited to the post-season party.

"We need to win at least five to get us in," Lady Cats' coach Matilda Mossman said. "We need to be in the finals of the Big Eight Tournament to have a chance for the NCAA's."

The Lady Buffs certainly dimmed those chances with their 21st win of the season. Colorado used strong bench play and an advantage of 17 in the rebounding department to help extend the Lady Cats' worst losing streak of the season.

K-State looked to be on its way to a lopsided half-time deficit, down 35-29 with 4:48 remaining before intermission. But, led by Arneetrice Cobb's six quick points, the Lady Cats used an 8-2 spurt to pull even, 37-37, at the half.

To begin the second half, the Lady Cats built themselves a 51-50 lead but then went cold, scoring just two points in a five-minute span that saw Colorado open up a 65-53 lead with 8:22 remaining.

A Diana Miller three-point goal got the Lady Cats to 69-64 with 4:48 left, but K-State was to get no closer, as the Lady Buffs sewed up their first-ever Big Eight title.

"Coming into tonight's game, we were still fighting for the title," Mossman said. "Losing tonight didn't cause us that chance, but losing at Iowa State and Nebraska did."

Mossman was talking of the Lady Cats' back-to-back road losses that saw K-State drop from just two games below Colorado in the standings to four games out with nearly no chance of winning the conference championship.

"We made a lot of mistakes tonight," Mossman said of the Colorado game, "but if we had played this well in our last two games, we would still be fighting for the title.

"Colorado has a good team that really works well together. They are very deserving of the title. Now there's a battle for second and I hope we're in that battle at the end."

The Lady Cats held Colorado's leading scorer, Bridgette Turner, to just 12 points in the contest, but the Lady Buffs' reserves contributed 32 points to help even out the scoring.

K-State, now 16-8 on the year and 6-5 in conference play, was led by Diana Miller's 17 points, while Mary Jo Miller and Nadira Hazim each added 10.

After the tough three-game road trip, the Lady Cats finally return home to Bramlage Coliseum Saturday for a 7:30 p.m. matchup with arch-rival Kansas.

'Hawks scare OU, lose in overtime

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — Stacey King scored seven points in overtime and grabbed a crucial rebound Wednesday night, lifting No. 1 Oklahoma past Kansas 94-89 in a rousing rematch between last year's NCAA finalists.

King, held to 14 points when regulation ended in an 80-80 deadlock, scored the first two buckets in the extra period as the Sooners went to 22-3 overall and 8-1 in the Big Eight.

After Lincoln Minor's bucket brought the Jayhawks to within 90-89, King pulled down a Jayhawk miss and a moment later hit a short jumper for a 92-89 lead.

Oklahoma, which beat the Jayhawks 123-95 at home in their first meeting this season, took its biggest lead of the game 79-74 on Mike Bell's dunk with 2:49 left in regulation.

A Mark Randall follow shot made it 79-76, then Randall hit a pair of free throws to make it a 2-point lead and Kansas got the ball with 48 seconds left on the alternate possession.

With two seconds left, Kevin Pritchard worked inside for an 80-80 tie.

The Sooners, playing their first game since getting the No. 1 ranking for the second time this month, committed three turnovers in the opening minutes and normally sure-shot Mookie Blaylock threw up two air balls, further inciting the sellout crowd.

The Sooners finally got the lead on William Davis' three-point play that made it 36-34 with 2:19 to go in the half.

'Boys of Summer' return to camp

By The Associated Press

The most glorious words in sports and to some, the sweetest in all of the English language: pitchers and catchers report.

Baseball is back. Spring training starts today.

For Jack Clark, Eddie Murray, Bruce Hurst, Steve Sax and other all-stars, it means a new team. For Dallas Green, Doug Rader, Jeff Torborg and other managers, it's a new chance.

For some like Jim Abbott, a new beginning. For others like Ron Guidry or Dan Quisenberry, perhaps an end.

To fans, it's a time of hope and optimism. All played out under the sun in Florida and Arizona.

Every team is even, at least in the standings. And maybe if those rookies are as good as they say and if the aging slugger can have one more good year and if the injured shortstop returns to form and if the wild pitcher gets his control, well then maybe this could just be the year.

Why not? It happened, in its own way, to the Los Angeles Dodgers last season.

Today, the Dodgers and half the major league teams will open camp. The Dodgers begin the quest to do what no team has done since the New York Yankees in 1977-78, to win consecutive World Series.

"For the first time in a long time, we go to spring training with our starting eight pretty set," Los Angeles general manager Fred Claire said.

Among the newcomers at Vero Beach, Fla., will be Murray, a seven-time All-Star who will fill a weak-spot at first base. Also joining the team, to play second base, is Willie Randolph, who left the New York Yankees as a free agent when Sax left the Dodgers as a free agent for the Yankees.

Not all the Dodgers will be in camp right away. Orel Hershiser, the team's miracle worker, has a salary arbitration hearing in Los Angeles today. He's guaranteed at least $2 million, up from last season's $1.1 million.

In Yuma, Ariz., the new-look San Diego Padres will prepare to challenge the Dodgers. Clark, one year removed from being the National League's most feared hitter, was acquired from the Yankees, and pitcher Walt Terrell was obtained from Detroit.

Hurst, the object of an intense free-agent bidding war, signed with San Diego. Now we'll see whether he will become another former Boston left-hander to win big in the NL, just like John Tudor and Bob Ojeda.

Ojeda will try to recover from a lawn accident last fall that almost cost him a finger and, Manager Davey Johnson thinks, might have cost the New York Mets a chance to beat the Dodgers in the playoffs. The Mets tried to make a move during the winter but didn't, failing to get Dale Murphy, Mark Langston, Danny Tartabull or Ellis Burks.

Oakland, the American League champion, got free agent Mike Moore. That gives the Athletics the best pitching staff in the league. At least in spring training and on paper it does.

"We're starting this year with a sense of some unfinished business," Oakland general manager Sandy Alderson said. "We wanted to win it all, and the Dodgers beat us."

Texas and California made moves in hope of keeping close to Oakland.

The Rangers begin spring training as strangers after the most active winter in the majors. Nolan Ryan, a Texas folk hero, was taken from Houston in the free-agent frenzy and .300 hitters Julio Franco and Rafael Palmeiro were acquired in trades. As a result, reliever Mitch Williams is now with the Chicago Cubs and Pete O'Brien and Oddibe McDowell are in Cleveland.

The Angels, who failed to sign Hurst or Ryan, wound up with Claudell Washington in the outfield.

Hey, Toto, major league baseball is back

Svoboda on Sports

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Columnist

Toto, let's dream that we're not in Kansas anymore.

Let's hop in that flying house of ours and head toward Florida.

What's that, you scrawny little mutt? You want to stay here with the snow on the ground and temperatures barely reaching freezing?

I'll pass. I want a better life. I want a life with baseball.

And if I click my heels together, I might just end up in Florida or Arizona, where I can get both in abundance beginning today.

Major league baseball is back, and though there's no place like home, there's also no better game than baseball. So long, you mutt. I'm headin' south.

Pardon the strange beginning, and my apologies to Dorothy for my pinch-hitting for her. But when pitchers and catchers report to Florida and Arizona to open spring training — as they will today — I become slightly unbalanced.

Baseball, our national pastime, is the thing I miss most when it's gone. To me, the months of November, December and January are the three toughest months of the year. Pro football, basketball and hockey are just games to bridge the gap from the end of the World Series to the opening of spring training.

Three colors of blood are being pumped to this heart of mine — a heart my tin friend unfortunately didn't have until he had gone through a can or two of Rustoleum.

If ever I need a transfusion, you'd better have some Nile green blood for my fraternity; purple plasma for K-State; and royal blue blood for my team, the Kansas City Royals.

Ah, yes, those 1985 World Champion Kansas City Royals. Those 1976, 1977, 1978, 1980, 1981 (second half), 1984 and 1985 American League Western Division Champion Kansas City Royals.

A new season brings new hope, and I'm full of it. But you knew that already, and I'm sure some of you probably think I'm full of a few other things as well.

Kansas City fans have one big reason for optimism. Look at the World Series years of 1980 and 1985. One thing those Royals teams had made them special, and it's something they have again in 1989 — a top-flight catcher.

In 1980, the man was Darrell Porter. His smooth left-handed swing and cool handling of the pitching staff were just the tonics the Royals needed. Then the bum went to St. Louis, and did nothing more than help the Cardinals win a world title in 1982.

In 1985, it was Jim Sundberg's turn. Sunny did little more than help a pitching staff full of youngsters become the best in all of baseball. Remember how well Bret Saberhagen pitched in 1985? Get ready for a return of those salad days.

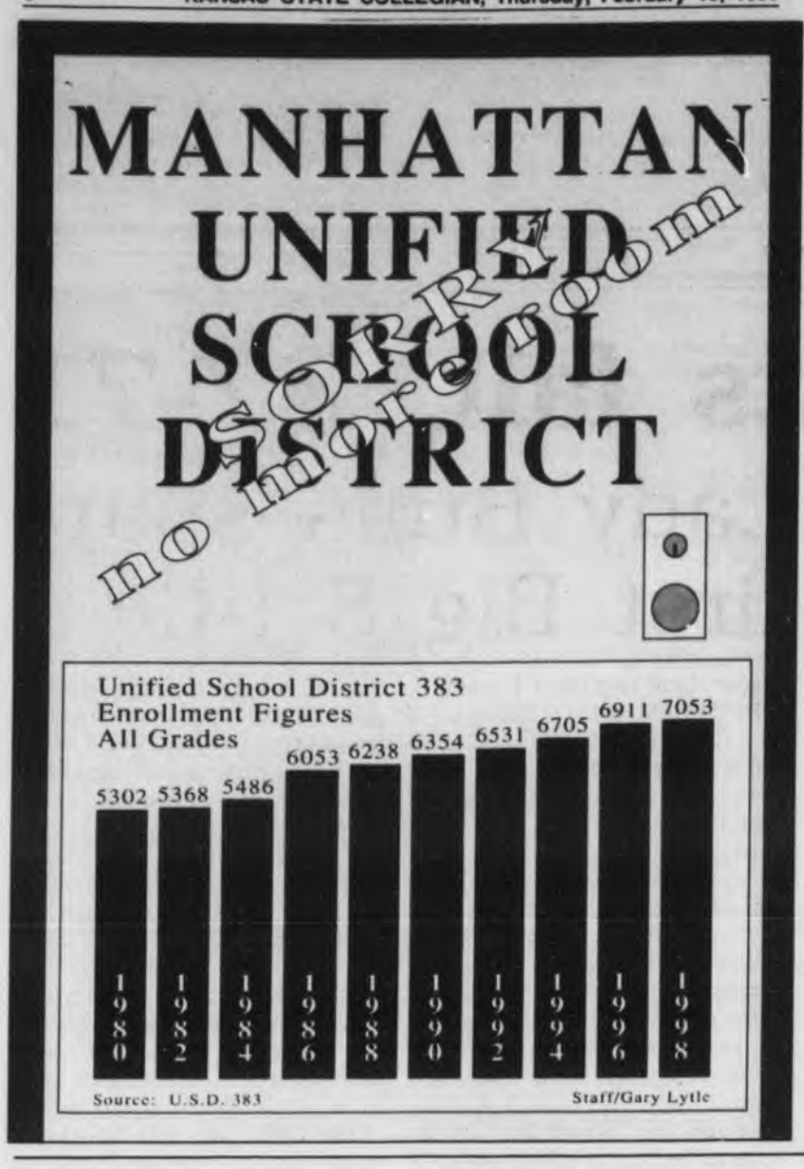
In 1989, it's Bob Boone. The guy gives the Royals even more gold up the middle. If you were to take all the Gold Glove awards Boone, second baseman Frank White and center fielder Willie Wilson have won and melt them down, you could put Fort Knox out of business for good.

In addition, Boone is probably more qualified to call a game and keep a young pitching staff mentally in it than, say, a Jamie Quirk or Mike Macfarlane. Jamie's up in the Bronx Zoo now, anyway.

Boone is also coming off his best offensive season. That bodes well. If he can catch at least 120 games and help Macfarlane along, he'll be worth his weight in gold.

But enough already with the Royals. A few other quickies before I go back to the mutt and Auntie Em.

■ This is likely Dan Quisenberry's final spring training. The former Royal relief ace is in the St. Louis camp, and unless he can find his sinker again, he's more than likely finished. Here's hoping he can. Dan's a class act, and there aren't too many of those left.



■ Isn't it unfortunate that two of the worst teams in all of baseball play on superstations? To go with it, we get a Caray on each telecast. Papa Harry and son Skip broadcast for the Chicago Cubs and Atlanta Braves. And, in deference to the Hall of Fame voters, Harry makes me sick. I like Skip, though. It's cocktail hour at the launching pad.

■ The San Diego Padres, with Bruce Hurst and Jack Clark getting all the credit while Tony Gwynn does all the work, are a good bet to win the NL West. The Dodgers have an old AL all-star lineup of Eddie Murray, Willie Randolph and Kirk Gibson. But the key word here is "old." And if the Padres do win it, Pete Rose is done as a manager in Cincinnati.

■ The Bash Brothers from the Bay Area, the Oakland Athletics, will not even win their division this year. Simple AL West history dictates that. Since the Royals took back-to-back crowns in 1984 and 1985, California, Minnesota and Oakland have all taken turns at the top. But don't look for Texas to be next. Sure the team's got a dugout-load of hitters, but its pitching staff is either using Grecian Formula or Pampers.

Well, it's about time to hop back in the house and return to reality and the mutt. Oh, well. Maybe the snow will go away and I'll get to see a college game at Frank Myers Field on Saturday. And if it doesn't, it will soon.

Then there will truly be no place like home ... because baseball will be here, too.

Crowded

three years after 1988, while current enrollment is about 3,300 students, the report states.

Some elementary schools were forced to transfer sections of classes to other schools to alleviate overcrowding in 1988.

Bluemont Elementary School has in the past moved some of its classroom activities to the basement and stage areas to provide more room.

Ray Woods, principal of Marlatt Elementary School, said he is optimistic about Marlatt maintaining available classrooms for non-essential subjects like art and vocal and instrumental music.

However, Woods said he did not rule out a situation where a section from another elementary school would be transferred to Marlatt.

"We are pretty fortunate to have (an art room)," Woods said. "Marlatt has stabilized enrollment, but I could see giving up the art room next year."

During board meetings last year, Rowe said a temporary redrawing of attendance lines to relieve pressure on the burdened areas throughout the district has worked in the past.

Although providing the district with temporary relief, redrawing attendance lines was not meant as a long-range solution, he said.

Brent Bowman and Associates, a local architectural firm, submitted a bid to the board in April for a new elementary school which would accommodate more than 500 students. The bid described a school of medium to good quality, costing the district about $3.5 million dollars.

collect.

The Senate rejected the House version Wednesday on an unrecorded vote after some parliamentary dueling by Burke and Minority Leader Michael Johnston, D-Parsons. Johnston offered a motion to consider the bill containing the House amendments.

The bill that passed would reduce individual income taxes by $69 million, while creating a temporary "reappraisal circuit-breaker" for those hardest hit by property tax increases in November. That measure would cost an estimated $10 million, but critics of the measure say that figure is far too low.

The bill also would reinstate a controversial deduction for federal taxes paid, one that was repealed by the Legislature last year.

"Many people wanted the option back," Oleen said. "The bill speaks to the issues of the people of Kansas."

The Homestead Property Tax Refund Program was expanded by the tax bill. It increased the maximum refund for property taxes from $400 to $500. Cost of the expansion is estimated at $2 million. The decade-old Homestead program provides property tax relief for certain eiderly and disabled individuals.

Another provision in the bill is to increase the income tax rebate to school districts from 20 percent to 23 percent for tax year 1989 and 24 percent in 1990. Presently, 20 percent of all income taxes collected within a school district is returned to the district. However, 85 percent of that amount is deducted from the state aid the school districts receive.

That measure would decrease property taxes for schools by about $28 million in two years, $14 million more than Hayden's plan, which would have increased the rebate to 22 percent.

"The rebate is very favorable for Manhattan and Riley County," Oleen said. "There will be a definite impact upon our local schools."

Critics of the provision say it would benefit wealthier school districts, which do not receive school aid, and hurt rural districts.

Some senators said the cost of property tax relief for those hardest hit is going to cost more than the projected $10 million.

"I don't believe there is any validity to that $10 million figure," said Sen. Phil Martin, D-Pittsburg. "I think it's much higher than that."

Under the bill, those homeowners with incomes of $35,000 or less would be eligible for property tax relief if their taxes increase more than 50 percent as a result of reappraisal.

Martin said Wyandotte County alone could use up the $10 million for property tax relief.

"If we're talking about putting just $10 million in this fund, then it's just a smokescreen," Martin said.

Burke said additional property tax relief could haunt the Legislature for the rest of the session as counties mail reappraisal notices to property owners.

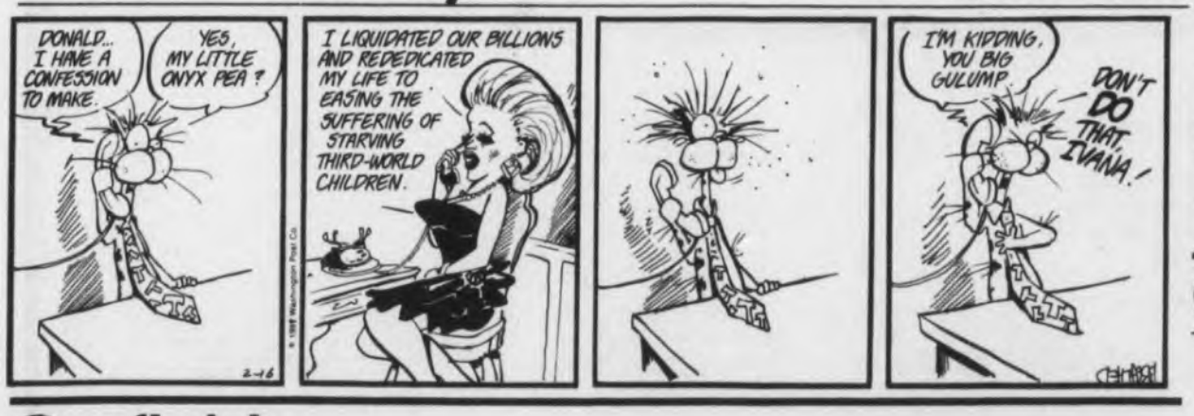
SALAD

BY RICHARD BROADFOOT

COMIC REVIEW:
"A MODERN DAY FABLE" ★★½

PLOT SUMMARY: A NAIVE, YOUNG BAIT SALESMAN IS KNOCKED COLD AFTER CATCHING A WHIFF OF SOME SPOILED STINK BAIT... HE THEN DREAMS THAT HE, ALONG WITH THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, IS TRANSPORTED TO A PARALLEL DIMENSION POPULATED BY NETWORK TV POLITICAL ANALYSTS...

CHARACTERS: JEFFREY, THOUGH A BIT HOMELY, IS BELIEVABLE AS THE BAIT SALESMAN... DAN QUAYLE AS VICE-PRESIDENT, HOWEVER, SEEMS TOO FAR-FETCHED...



ACTION: AS FUN-FILLED, FAMILY-ORIENTED ENTERTAINMENT WITH A MESSAGE... WELL, IT'S NO "RAMBO: FIRST BLOOD 2."

MORALS: 1. DON'T PICK YOUR VICE-PRESIDENT THE WAY YOU CHOOSE FLOOR-COVERING (I KNOW HONEY... BUT WOULDN'T IT MAKE THE CABINETS LOOK SO MUCH BETTER...?)
2. NEVER WRITE TWO WEEKS WORTH OF COMICS AFTER AN ALL-NIGHT OREO BINGE...

Jazz festival to include 18 bands

By The Collegian Staff

Eighteen bands will compete for judges at the 20th annual Central States Jazz Festival Friday in Nichols Theatre.

Bands from nine high schools, six community colleges, the University of Kansas and K-State will perform from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Awards for outstanding work will be presented at 5 p.m.

In the past, the festival has been held in McCain Auditorium, but due to scheduling conflicts, the festival will be in Nichols Theatre.

The National Association of Jazz Educators, which originated at K-State in 1958, will present several awards for outstanding soloists. The Southern Comfort, the company which produces Southern Comfort bourbon, will present a soloist an award that will pay for the jazz camp of his or her choice.

Each band will play for a set of judges and receive a rating from one, which is superior, to five. The judges will be Mike Parkinson and Bill Caldwell from Kansas City, Kan., Kim George from Alma, and Steve Slater from Wichita.

Matt Betton, a Manhattan resident and one of the founders of the National Association of Jazz Educators, said the major reason the festival was started was to draw students to a better university.

The association wanted to get the very young students interested in coming to K-State, Betton said.

Betton was a judge the first three years the festival was conducted. He said bands are judged on correct and steady rhythm, good improvisation, suitability of music for each band, and tempo changes.

Judges aren't necessarily impressed with pieces that are too difficult for the band to play, Betton said.

"(Judges) look for material that is suitable for the band," he said.

The festival is open to the public and admission is free.

'Zero tolerance' policy altered

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Discovery of small quantities of illegal drugs will no longer be sufficient reason for federal agents to seize commercial fishing vessels at sea, according to a change in the government's "zero tolerance" policy.

Coast Guard Adm. Paul Yost and Customs Service Commissioner William von Raab are issuing interim guidelines, expected to be announced today, to conform with a congressional mandate that was included in anti-drug legislation signed into law in November, Coast Guard and Customs officials said.

Under the policy that began last March, federal agents were free to seize vessels within 12 miles of the U.S. coastline if any amount of illegal drugs was found on board.

Recreational boat owners were furious, complaining that they could face the loss of millions of dollars worth of property if a crew member or guest possessed a trace of marijuana without the boat owner's knowledge. And commercial fishermen said they could lose their livelihoods even if they were eventually found innocent and their vessels were returned.

Fee

freezing the fee at $80 until 1993, Tout said.

If approved, the bill would also change the optional fee for part-time students (those enrolled in six hours or less of classwork) to a required fee of $25. Summer school students would pay $5 per credit hour, and part-time and summer school students would not be subject to an increase after fall 1989, under the plan.

The proposed fee increases were based on 5 to 6 percent salary increases and a projected 10 percent boost in enrollment during the next five years.

Between 1976 and 1982, the health fee was increased $4.30 each year. From 1983 to 1986 it rose $5 a year. Student health fees have not increased during the last three years.

Lafene must recover from the loss of revenue, Oetinger said.

"A $15 hike seems like a big chunk, but it has to make up for the three years the health center went without the $5 increase," he said.

Because the fee has not gone up, Lafene has been forced to cut student services, said Mike Lynch, associate vice president for institutional advancement.

Lafene's hospital and in-patient services were closed at the end of the fall 1987 semester, Lynch said. The food service was also closed and five nursing positions were eliminated in the cutbacks.

"The other (out-patient) services have been maintained, but we can't do that anymore without a fee increase," he said.

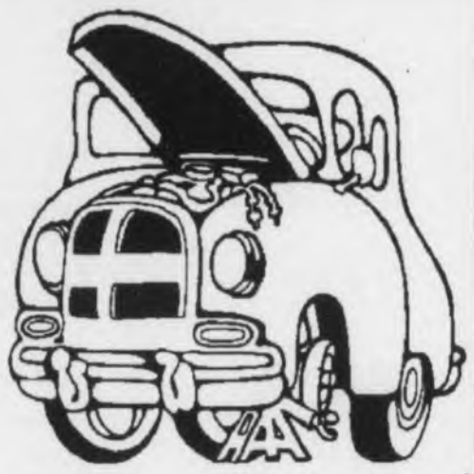
Tout said fewer services are being offered now than in 1986, but are costing more money.

The Counseling Center and the Mental Health Clinic were combined in July in order to save Lafene about $50,000 a year, Lynch said. The centers now share office space on the second floor.

Lafene is entirely student-funded and receives no state or federal money.

"What the students don't fund, we don't have," Tout said.

The advisory committee and Lafene officials will hold an open forum at noon tommorow in the Union's Little Theater. Tout, Oetinger, Lynch and Moeller will be present to answer questions.



Student Senate will hear the first reading of the student health fee bill at 7 p.m. tonight in the Union Big Eight Room. Lafene officials and advisory committee members will give a presentation, Lynch said.

KSU KANSAS STATE UNIVERSITY

CONFERENCE
principal-counselor-student

The Office of Admissions cordially invites former students of these high schools to attend the 1989 Principal-Counselor-Student Conference. High school principals and counselors will be on campus to visit with you about your preparation for and experiences in KSU academic programs. Your participation will help the University build a stronger relationship with your former high school faculty.

You are welcome to drop by between 10:15 a.m. and 12:15 p.m. on Thursday, Feb. 16. This is an excellent opportunity for you to renew old friendships with former classmates. The Provost has asked that your instructors excuse you from these class periods.

Student Senate hears proposal on health fee

By Kendra Gensemer
Government Editor

Student Senate heard presentations Thursday by officials from Lafene Student Health Center and the KSU Athletic Department asking for raises in student fees.

Senate heard first readings of a student health fee bill that would increase the student health fee from $60 to $75 for full-time students. If approved next week by Student Senate, the new fee would go into effect fall 1989.

The bill will not be brought to student vote in a referendum.

The proposed athletic fee bill, which is still being discussed by committee, will not be introduced to Senate until possibly next week. If approved by Senate the issue would go to referendum.

The two-year plan for a student health fee increase would charge full-time students $15 more per semester. Part-time students now have the option of paying either a one-time $60 fee or $25 for each visit up to three visits. Under the proposed bill, part-time students would be charged a one-time $25 fee and would have access to the same services as full-time students. Summer school students would pay a $5 per-credit- hour fee instead of the current $4 per-credit-hour fee.

Every year the plan would be re-evaluated by Student Senate and the Student Health Advisory Committee. Projected revenue and expenditures would be re-evaluated and fee adjustments requests would be made accordingly, said Doug Oettinger, chairman of the Student Health Advisory Committee.

Lafene officials said if a fee increase is not implemented, the health center would be broke sometime next spring because projected expenditures will exceed revenue.

"By law, that can't (be allowed to) happen," said Dr. Robert Tout, director of Lafene. He gave three solutions that could prevent that from happening: increased student fees, increased charges or a further cut in services.

Even with projected enrollment increases, if the student fee from which Lafene is funded stays at $60 and services continue as they are, the center would be in debt $522,000 by 1991, Tout said.

Assistant Vice President for Institutional Advancement Mike Lynch said the fee is based on projections of Lafene's annual budget. He said those projections include the level at which the health fee is set, student enrollment figures, Lafene employees' salary increases and increased cost of such things as pharmaceuticals and commodities.

Dr. Larry Moeller, Lafene's chief of staff, said the health center provides unlimited access to a health care clinic that offers services at a cost less than that of other Manhattan community services.

He gave the example of the cost of treating an injured ankle. One office visit, X-rays, a cast and a follow-up exam at Lafene costs a student $59. The same services at a local orthopedic clinic costs at least $215, he said.

Although non-users would pay the fee, Moeller said it would be "supporting what is good for the community."

Officials said increasing malpractice rates, which are paid by the doctors, are not the primary cause of the needed increase.

The average salary of Lafene physicians is $73,000 before taxes, benefits and malpractice premiums are deducted. After deducting the current malpractice premium rate of about $10,000, their average take-

Student falls from Marlatt Hall

By Alan Wilds
Staff Writer

A student remains in critical condition at a Topeka hospital after falling from the sixth floor of Marlatt Hall Thursday at about 9:10 a.m.

Cheryl May, director of university news, said the victim was Hai Quach, freshman undeclared. She said Quach apparently forced the screen loose or removed it and then fell or jumped from the window ledge of his room in 610 Marlatt.

"It has not yet been determined whether or not he jumped," May said. "There have been incidents in the past where students have goofed around on the ledges."

The K-State police officers handling the investigation were not available to comment on the case.

Quach was taken by ambulance to The St. Mary Hospital in Manhattan before being taken to St. Francis Hospital in Topeka and finally to Stormont-Vail Regional Medical Center.

A spokesperson with Stormont-Vail community services reported that Quach arrived in the emergency room around noon and was treated for multiple system injuries, meaning numerous fractures and lacerations.

Hospital officials said numerous tests were being run to determine the full extent of his injuries, which was not known at the time.

Quach was moved to the intensive care unit Thursday afternoon and officials said his condition should remain the same overnight.

David Yoder, Marlatt Hall director, would not comment on the incident.

Susan Scott, associate dean of student life, said whenever a student crisis such as this arises she makes an effort to reach family members and students who may need help in coping.

May said that Quach was born in Saigon, Vietnam in June of 1968. Quach graduated from Phillipsburg High School in Phillipsburg, Kan.

College of Architecture places limit on enrollment numbers

By Lance Schwulst
Collegian Reporter

The Office of Admissions has sent letters advising all incoming freshmen and transfer students planning on enrolling in the College of Architecture and Design that a cap has been placed on enrollment and studio spots will not be available for all who have applied.

The cap on studio spots has been placed at 225 students, said Mark Lapping, dean of the college. More than 1,300 students have shown interest in the college — 600 have already been accepted by K-State.

"We've had about 20 calls so far, but we're anticipating a whole lot more," Lapping said.

Students who do not get a studio spot will still be allowed to enroll in the college, but will be one year behind in a five-year sequence, he said.

"The students will still take all of the history and theory courses. They just won't be in a studio," Lapping said. "They can reapply, but there is nothing to guarantee that even after the freshman year they will get a studio spot."

Lapping said that during the past four years, the college has experienced more than a 50 percent increase in enrollment, but only about a 3 percent increase in budget.

"The reality is that we've been on a growth mode, but the resources are not there," he said. "We want to maintain the integrity of our program. We do not want to distort our teaching by becoming a program that just flunks people out."

Provost James Coffman said the college's enrollment was about 1,200 students in 1980 and about 725 in 1984. Today, the college has about 1,000 students.

"When you have these studio extensive classes, which are expensive, and extreme swings in enrollment, some sort of enrollment stabilization is needed," Coffman said.

State funding based on enrollment figures has a two-year lag time, he said. An increase in enrollment for one year will not be reflected in the budget until after two years.

All of the land-grant schools have some sort of enrollment cap which Coffman said does not go against the concept of open enrollment.

"(The cap) does not preclude admission to the University, just the program," he said. "I'm sure the cap will cause some concern, but the overall effect of a much better program will be appreciated."

Lapping said K-State is the only University with "wide-open enrollment."

"KU only has 144 spots open per year which hasn't changed in the last ten years," he said.

In a letter from Coffman to Lapping and President Jon Wefald dated February 23, 1988, Coffman said he recognized the enrollment problem, but did not offer any additional funds.

The letter stated, " ... it is clear that proper budgeting and planning is very difficult in the present environment. Given that, the purpose of this letter is to ask you and your colleagues to develop a proposal which includes enrollment caps, admissions criteria and methodology ... ."

"We've spent over two years now talking about who should be accepted and who shouldn't," Lapping said. "This is a collective decision of this college and central administration."

The criteria were voted on twice by the college's faculty and both times were approved by unanimous votes with only two abstentions, Lapping said.

The new admission requirements examine the prospective student's high school or junior college academic record. Enclosed with

Regents give approval

Education center construction to begin

By Nancy Prosser
Staff Writer

TOPEKA — Plans for a Regents Educational Communication Center to be built on K-State's campus were approved Thursday by the Kansas Board of Regents at its meeting in Topeka.

K-State can now begin construction on the center's building, which should be completed by the end of April 1990. The center is temporarily operating out of Umberger Hall, said Mel Chastain, head of the Broadcasting Education Center.

"The new center will be constructed north of Umberger Hall, and will face east," Chastain said.

The center, which will be funded by the regents schools, grants and the Margin of Excellence Plan, will provide a satellite link among all the regents institutions, he said. It will also be available to Kansas high schools who link-up with the system.

"There is currently a Spanish I program available for high school students that K-State developed," Chastain said. "Most programs that will be available through the center have been developed by K-State."

Chastain said the ultimate goal of the center will be to have two-way audio and visual communications.

"The communication possibilities are almost endless," he said.

"Currently, K-State has committed $300,000 of its Margin of Excellence funds to the project," Chastain said. "The Star Schools Program that was started by Sen. Ted Kennedy (D-Mass.) is a $20 million federally funded program for the education of math and science through satellite."

K-State applied for and recieved funding through the Star Schools Program, and will continue to actively pursue funds during the building period, he said.

"Many times the institution that can afford the service the least, needs it the most," Chastain said. "As the level of funding increases, equal access to the center will increase."

Because the center uses television productions to educate, Regent Jack Sampson expressed his concerns about the quality of programs which could be produced at the center.

"Like it or not, you are in show business," Sampson said. "We must have people in the center who can make and produce programs that people will learn from."

Chastain said K-State already has about 14 staff members who provide base level programming.

"There will also be space available at the center for faculty offices of the School of Journalism and Mass Communication," he said.

In other business, Stanley Koplik, executive director of the Board of Regents, reported that a bill on qualified admissions was introduced to a Legislative committee this past week.

The board also granted K-State authority to seek to purchase liability insurance for Lafene Student Student Health Center physicians through student health fee funds. A proposal will go before the Legislature in the current session.

The board also granted K-State the authority to negotiate to purchase 40 acres of land west of Manhattan to expand the Kansas Artificial Breeding Unit. This proposal will also have to go to the Legislature for approval.

In other business, the board approved all of the regents schools' Institutional Assessment Plans, which are used to track the progress of students through college. K-State's plan is unique in that it emphasizes not only academic, but personal and social development.

The regents approved the appointment of John Lambert, director of public safety, as K-State's parking hearing officer.

The regents also approved a proposal to drop a degree program at the University of Kansas. A multi/interdisciplinary program in personnel administration will no longer be offered at KU.

"After faculty changes we questioned whether or not the quality of the degree program could be continued," said Gene Budig, KU Chancellor.

Navy captain facing charges

SUBIC BAY NAVAL BASE, Philippines — A military judge on Thursday dropped one of three charges against a Navy captain accused of abandoning scores of Vietnamese refugees who later resorted to cannibalism to survive at sea.

The judge ruled prosecutors failed to present evidence that Capt. Alexander Balian, former skipper of the USS Dubuque, refused to assist a man who tried to swim to the warship when it crossed paths with the refugee boat on June 9.

Balian faces another charge of "wrongfully failing to render assistance" to a second Vietnamese who also tried to swim to the Dubuque, and a third charge of dereliction of duty for failing to render adequate assistance to the other refugees.

If convicted, Balian could be sentenced to two years and three months in jail, forfeiture of all benefits and dismissal from the service.

The military judge, Capt. James Freyer, ordered the first charge dropped on a motion of defense lawyer Dan Donato as soon as the prosecution rested its case on the fifth day of Balian's court-martial.

The Dubuque was en route to the Persian Gulf when it encountered the refugee boat 230 miles north of the Philippine island of Palawan. The boat, crammed with 83 Vietnamese, had been at sea since leaving Vietnam on May 22.

United Nations officials in Manila said nearly 20 other refugees died of starvation before the encounter with the Dubuque and only 52 survived when the "boat people" were rescued by Filipino fishermen on June 27.

Actor recovering from surgery

SANTA MONICA, Calif. — Surgeons inserted a pin in the shoulder of actor James Caan, and he should be released from St. Johns Hospital and Medical Center in a week, his publicist said Thursday.

Caan, who broke four ribs and suffered a separated shoulder when he crashed his motorcycle Sunday, was in good spirits, said Paul Bloch.

"He had a screw put in his left shoulder," said Bloch. "They expect another week of hospitalization."

Caan, 48, was headed to lunch in Santa Monica with three motorcycle buddies when a car swerved in their path, said Bloch. Caan grabbed too hard on the brakes and was tossed over the handlebars, he said.

Soviet comedian married

WAIKOLOA, Hawaii — Soviet comedian Yakov Smirnoff and Linda Dreeszen were married on a Hawaii Island cliff overlooking the Pacific Ocean.

The new Mrs. Smirnoff, 27, arrived for Tuesday's ceremony in a helicopter, which the couple used to depart on the first leg of their honeymoon, according to Smirnoff's public relations company David Kramer & Associates.

Smirnoff, 38, and his wife will ski at Deer Valley, Utah, and then take a seven-day Caribbean cruise before returning to their home in Hollywood Hills, Calif., the company said.

Sea lion dies after surgery

SEATTLE — Biologists trying to protect migrating fish said Thursday the death of one of two captured sea lions wouldn't deter efforts to snare more of the fish-eating mammals and return them to the ocean.

The 550-pound animal had a week-old bullet wound in its neck and died after coming out from under anesthesia administered so wildlife agents could examine him and attach a radio transmitter.

The wound and an infestation of lung worms "may have compromised his ability ... to withstand the anesthesia," said Bob DeLong, a marine mammal biologist with the National Marine Fisheries Service.

"Using anesthesia on the animal was one of the risks that went along with studying them," he said.

Clerk charged with theft

WICHITA — A former Haysville School District employee was charged with 36 felony counts in the theft of money from a high school activity fund.

Arlene Johnson, 40, was released on $2,500 bond following her initial appearance Thursday in Sedgwick County District Court. She was charged with 17 counts of felony theft, 17 counts of misuse of public funds and two counts of making a false writing.

The criminal complaint alleges the theft of an amount in excess of $10,000 from Campus High School between January 1987 and September 1988. Assistant District Attorney David Moses said in court there is evidence of thefts before January 1987, but the statute of limitations precluded charges.

When the investigation became public in November, a Haysville School District spokesman said between $10,000 and $50,000 was missing from the activity fund, which is money from parents and students paying for yearbooks, club dues and admission to athletic events.

Boys found dynamite first

GREAT BEND — A homemade bomb detonated by a bomb disposal unit on Wednesday was found earlier in the month by two boys who opened it and found three sticks of dynamite, officials said.

Jason Welcher and Jay Jacobs, both 11, found the bomb behind a Great Bend residence on Sunday, Feb. 5. They said when they opened the lid to the box, they had an idea of what they had found.

"It looked like a bomb, and it had a fuse and you'd light them," Welcher said. "There were wires connecting them and I told Jay it was a bomb. We knew it was a bomb, so we didn't want to get close to it."

The boys told their parents about what they had found, but the parents thought they must have been talking about road flares.

The incident was dropped until Barton County Sheriff's Office Deputy Warren Peterson was contacted by one of the boy's mothers on Wednesday. Peterson saw the dynamite and contacted city police.

That set in motion events Wednesday afternoon, which ended about 8:30 p.m. Wednesday when a bomb disposal unit from Fort Riley Army Base detonated the device.

Speech library to be dedicated

The Department of Speech will be honoring Norma D. Bunton by dedicating a library in her memory at 2 p.m. Saturday in Nichols Hall.

Bunton, who died of cancer last fall, was the head of the speech department from 1954 to 1985, when she retired. Bunton taught classes in speech and rhetoric.

The dedication will take place in Nichols Theatre and will be open to students, faculty, staff and community members.

"The library has been in existence in the building since the speech deparment moved there," said Harold Nichols, department head. "There will be a short story read that Bunton wrote and left among her personal belongings."

"People that knew her — old friends, faculty and alumni — will speak on her behalf and tell of their aquaintances with her," said Marci Maullar, public relations director for the department. "The library being dedicated is the size of a small classroom and contains books on speech, theater, rhetoric and debate-related topics."

The dedication is open to all students, upon applying for entry in the department office, Maullar said.

Questions raised about agricultural research

By Carol Knorr
Collegian Reporter

A forum concerning a lawsuit against land-grant institutions and a panel discussion on sustainable agriculture last week have increased interest in agriculture research at K-State.

Provost James Coffman said the entire discussion was beneficial, but one specific idea came from the two days of interaction.

"The discussions were beneficial in sharpening the realization that science generally, not just the Agricultural Experiment Station, lacks the capacity to ultimately forecast its own outcome," Coffman said.

"There are an array of social and economic difficulties and variables that contribute to this problem — it's not a simple problem," he said.

The discussions provided farmers and other interested people a way of communicating ideas to the researchers and bringing awareness to the public, said Stephen Anderson, American Agricultural Movement spokesman and family farmer.

Coffman agreed with Anderson and said the discussions show that K-State has reached a point where there is a constructive exchange of views.

"The forums are a far more fruitful way of dealing with the issues than taking (K-State) to court," he said.

Anderson said a group of individuals is considering bringing a lawsuit against K-State charging that the University is not complying with the Hatch Act of 1888. For legal reasons, those individuals do not wish to be recognized until they file suit, if they should decide to, he said.

The Hatch Act is the federal act that mandates research projects to help family farms, promote consumer welfare and foster "a sound and prosperous rural life," said Deb Jones, California Action Network director.

Land-grant institutions such as K-State receive partial funding from this act, Jones said.

Anderson said he had talked with some of the individuals considering the action after the forum and panel discussion.

He said the individuals were not certain what position K-State really took on the issue and pointed to the fact that during the panel discussion, one person asked, "Will the real K-State please stand up?"

The group was not certain whether the view voiced by Walter Woods, director of the Agricultural Experiment Station, or that of Coffman best represented the University, Anderson said.

"Walter Woods' view is that there is not a problem concerning the type of research K-State is conducting," he said, "and it seems that he doesn't want to hear anything different about (the research).

"Coffman's view is more reasonable. He believes this kind of input should be continued."

Woods said he did not attend the forum held Feb. 9 because the K-State agricultural researchers were not invited to attend. He said a previous commitment prevented him from attending the panel discussion Feb 10.

Woods declined comment on the issues because he had not attended the discussions.

"Almost everything we do is designed to help rural farming," said Kurt Feltner, associate director of the agricultural experiment station.

Feltner said the experiment station is conducting more than 600 different research programs currently and that all funding is accountable.

"I am extremely confident that there will be no lawsuit brought against K-State," Coffman said. "The total research agenda is accountable and successful.

"This year there have been internal reallocations for specific projects. An enormous amount of funding has been focused on sustainable agriculture and water quality, which directly affect rural farming."

Richard Seaton, University attorney, said he had no information concerning a lawsuit against K-State.

"If someone did file suit, I have no reason to believe they would be successful," Seaton said.

Rubella cases suspected

By Robert Short
Staff Writer

Two suspected cases of rubella were reported in the Manhattan and Ogden schools last week.

Riley County health officials are awaiting test results on one Manhattan High School student who is being treated by her family physician for a suspected case of rubella.

The two unconfirmed cases do not present immediate threat of an outbreak of the disease, said Kathy Dickey, nursing supervisor for the Riley County Health Department.

Children are given a vaccination for measles, mumps and rubella when they are 15 months old. Rubella is referred to as the German measles or the three-day measles, Dickey said.

The vaccination, known as the MMR, may not remain effective through adulthood, she said. Annually, about 5 percent of the children vaccinated contract one of the three diseases.

"Blood must be drawn before an absolute confirmation is made," she said. "The highest risk is to women in early pregnancy."

The rate of birth defects is high for women who have contracted the disease during the first trimester.

> "Blood must be drawn before an absolute confirmation is made."
> — Kathy Dickey, Riley County Health nursing supervisor

Common symptoms for rubella include a mild fever and a rash on the face or neck. The rash may not last for more than three days and is often confused with other childhood rashes, Dickey said.

Rubella can be spread either through direct contact with an infected individual or by contact with fluid from a sneeze or cough. Communicability lasts about one week before the rash appears and five days after after the rash disappears.

The incubation period for the disease ranges from 14 to 21 days, the average being about 18 days. During the incubation period, individuals may not be aware they have contracted the disease, Dickey said.

Children suspected of having rubella should not attend school and should be isolated from children and adults for up to one week after the rash appears, she said.

A December outbreak of measles in Lawrence is not related to possible rubella cases in Manhattan, Dickey said. Common measles and rubella are different diseases.

Bomb in radio-cassette player responsible for Pan Am crash

By The Associated Press

LOCKERBIE, Scotland — A radio-cassette player held the bomb that brought down Pan Am Flight 103, but the identity of the bomber still is not known, the top investigator of the bombing said Thursday.

Investigators believe the explosive that shattered the Boeing 747 on Dec. 21 was placed aboard the aircraft in Frankfurt, West Germany, where the flight began, said detective Chief Superintendant John Orr. It apparently had been put on the aircraft as checked baggage.

"New positive lines of inquiry are unfolding," he told a news conference in this southwestern Scottish town where the jumbo jet crashed, killing all 259 people aboard and 11 on the ground.

"While there is insufficient evidence at this stage to establish the identity of the person or group responsible for this dreadful crime, the progress made and the evidence obtained has been substantial," Orr said.

Asked whether the investigation would point to a specific country, Orr said: "It may."

On Feb. 8, the Jerusalem Post reported the bomb that destroyed the jet was hidden in a radio-cassette recorder and was traced to Frankfurt.

That report quoted unidentified investigators as saying the device was similar, but not identical, to one found earlier in the possession of members of Ahmed Jibril's extremist Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine-General Command. The group has denied involvement.

Orr said the brand name of the radio-cassette player had not been established and would not say whether it was a pocket-sized device or a larger model. Nor did he say whether investigators had located the detonator.

Anti-terrorist experts have said the explosive most likely used was Semtex, an odorless, highly malleable substance made in Czechoslovakia and known to be used by terrorist organizations.

Orr said he was "aware of some aspects of the explosive that was used" but declined to elaborate.

The discovery of the bomb's hiding place followed painstaking reconstruction of a baggage container from pieces — some no larger than a table knife — strewn over 40 miles of Scottish countryside.

"The reconstruction of the baggage container suggests that the explosive device may have been among the baggage from the Frankfurt flight," Orr said.

"The particular bag which contained the device has not been identified at this stage, but there is the most detailed work under way with forensic assistance to achieve this identification. I believe this can be done," he said.

Orr said the belief that Frankfurt was the origin of the bomb was based on "a balance of probabilities." Most of the 1,500 pounds of baggage in the container in which the bomb was located was checked in at Frankfurt, and the rest was "interline" baggage from other points.

Flight 103 originated in Frankfurt on a Boeing 727. At London's Heathrow Airport, the New York-bound flight was changed to a Boeing 747.

A spokesman for the Frankfurt prosecutor's office, which is coordinating the West German investigation into the crash, said of Orr's statement on the Frankfurt connection: "We have no knowledge about that."

Spokesman Jochen Schroers said such suppositions as the statement that the bomb "probably" came on board in Frankfurt "doesn't help us at all."

John Boyd, the chief constable for the area, said police had recovered more than 80 percent of the aircraft and about 10,000 pieces of personal property.

Oklahoma State part of art exchange

By The Collegian Staff

Art works on display at the Union Art Gallery mark the first exchange exhibit between art faculty at Oklahoma State University and K-State.

The exhibition, which runs through March 3, includes work by 10 of the 11 art faculty members at OSU. Paintings, photographs, metalwork, ceramics, drawings and mixed media are among the art types on display.

"There was no particular reason for choosing OSU, besides it being a Big Eight school," said Gary Woodward, head of the art department. "We'd like to trade with some other schools, so we could get exhibit exchanges going."

The art department doesn't have any plans regarding the specifics of future art trading.

"We were able to send two works from each of our faculty," Woodward said.

Those 50 works will be on display through February 26 in Gardiner Art Gallery at OSU.

The majority of the works in the OSU exhibit have been well-received, but two nude paintings have prompted two complaints to the Union director, Woodward said.

Students' reactions to the paintings vary.

"The paintings are very well done, but I feel a little squirmish around them," said Anita Wunder, junior in education. "It's just that you don't see nude paintings everywhere."

"They don't bother me. I've kind of come to expect nudity in art," said Kevin James, junior in psychology. "Although, the woman is a little skinny."

Legislature should reject proposal

Qualified admissions policy bad for Kansas

A new legislative session is upon us, and the issue of selective (qualified) admissions is once again rearing its ugly head. Leading the charge to place admission requirements on incoming university students is that champion of elitism, Board of Regents Executive Director Stan Koplik.

Although the topic originally arose from enrollment concerns at the University of Kansas, Koplik's regents have decided the goal of their pet policy is to better prepare students for college. By making academic requirements more stringent, they reason that students will better plan their high school curricula and breeze through their college courses.

A noble cause.

A backward approach.

The top-down strategy utilized by the regents to attack this "problem" assumes that Kansas high schools have simply been negligent in providing appropriate courses and guidance to students.

The fact is, many of these schools are too small or too underfunded to provide all the required courses. Although seemingly obvious, a program to better prepare high school students should start by focusing more resources on the high schools themselves, thereby allowing them to offer more diverse and higher-quality programs.

It seems foolish to try to mandate that Kansas high schools expand their class offerings, when many are clearly unable to do so. Under the regents' plan, a prospective student would be penalized for being brought up in a small town. The regents and their staff would do well to realize that a good many Kansans hail from towns with populations under 10,000.

Another terribly incorrect assumption being made by the regents is that high schools exist to serve only the college-bound.

For a large portion of Kansans, high school is the end of the educational road. Many smaller schools, due to limited resources, would be forced to choose between foreign language classes and vocational training classes.

To those individuals who will receive no further education, high school is much more important than to those who will receive four or five more years of learning. Parents of these youths have been paying taxes in Kansas for as long as those of the college-bound. Their needs should not be superceded.

The Board of Regents seems to be using admissions as a way to push off some of the universities' responsibilities onto the high schools. One of the requirements for college admission would be a foreign language class.

Commentary

Doug Folk

Collegian Columnist

This is one of the courses listed as necessary for success at college. But, students are able to receive diplomas from a state university without ever having taken a foreign language course.

If foreign languages are so vital to success at a university, which they probably are, then shouldn't regents institutions require them in their own curricula, before expecting it of high schools?

Another flaw in this admissions plan is its reliance on community colleges. If students fail to qualify for admission to a state university, they may attend a community college for two years, then be admitted.

Problems exist in Kansas' community college system that require extensive repair before these schools can be depended upon to automatically qualify "ill-prepared" Kansans for university admission.

While some of Kansas' community colleges are good, others do little to prepare students for the rigors of study at a state university. A community college that is "easier than high school," in the words of one graduate, can actually hinder a student's chances for success at a university.

The freshman and sophomore years are periods of adjustment for state university students. Students thrown into junior level classes after being lulled to sleep at a community college often find themselves struggling to keep up. Many times the student winds up dismissed from the university as a result.

Of course, part of the goal of admissions requirements is to predict success in college, either by grade point average or test scores. However, no statistics have ever been produced to substantiate this correlation.

Indeed, many examples can be produced of students who performed poorly in high school, but either matured or "buckled down" and succeeded in college. These students would be denied the chance to succeed by qualified admissions.

Another flaw in the admissions proposal stems from that old saying: "If it ain't broke, don't fix it."

Qualified admissions are being tabbed as a step toward academic excellence. While our state universities have many deficiencies, producing outstanding scholars doesn't appear to be one of them. Check out how we fare against the rest of the nation in producing Rhodes, Truman, Marshall and other scholars and fellows, then try to say there's a problem. The facts read differently.

Finally, we should look at the reasons that state universities, land-grant institutions in particular, were established. It wasn't to provide only a select few with a college education. Rather, state universities were intended to offer all citizens of the state an opportunity for higher education.

Wishing to improve students' college preparation is an excellent intention. Perhaps by researching this broad goal, the regents or the State Legislature can formulate a comprehensive plan toward that end.

The Kansas Legislature should soundly reject this qualified admissions proposal, which reeks of East Coast-style elitism. It is hoped our legislators will recognize that in this case, Kansas universities are leading, not lagging, their counterparts.

Cheating lowers value of higher education

The spring semester is well under way and that can only mean one thing — exams.

It often seems as if the exams hit all at once, which can result in long nights of cramming for test after test, often while working on a project or paper at the same time.

How students stand up to this stress differs from person to person. For many, as the time for test-taking nears, cheating may suddenly start to sound like a good idea.

Cheating means different things to different people. To some people, looking at an instructor's old exams is a form of cheating. To others, going so far as to look off crib notes tattooed on the bottom of their foot during a test is not considered cheating. They rationalize that, since the professor is unfair by making the tests so hard, it is only fair to cheat to even the odds.

Instructors look at cheating differently, as well. Some instructors go to great lengths to keep old tests from getting into students hands, while other instructors put their old tests on reserves at Farrell Library. Some even allow the students a page of notes to use during the test.

Regardless of the differences in moral judgments, a basic guideline still exists for cheating: If students are using something while taking the test they are not supposed to be using, then that is cheating.

While cheating may seem an easy way to make an easy grade — especially in tests that are not well monitored — it is actually an easy way to decrease the value of a university education.

The purpose of being here is to learn. If students cheat in order to make a good grade that will get them a good job when they graduate, they should re-evaluate their reasons for being here. It is the ethical thing to do.

The University has a strict honor code and guidelines about cheating available at the Student Governing Offices that go in to great depth about the consequences and penalties for cheating and dishonesty.

Perhaps the next time students feel the need to cheat, they should read it. It should definitely be required reading for all students at the University.

Ends justify means in sports

If the ends justify the means, then I've got it all figured out. All that is necessary is some sisterly cooperation. By all means it is possible to see the footall Wildcats next season in Miami's Orange Bowl. Here's how this can be accomplished.

There is going to be one and only one expectation to base the above statement on — Money! Money! Money!

I characterize a winner as one who can separate a bowl committee from its money. Due to penalties, probation powers like Oklahoma, Oklahoma State and eventually Nebraska will not be permitted in bowl games. What if we can strike a deal with the probation schools in our conference to have K-State whip up on them for a couple of years?

This way the 'Cats can advance to the conference crown and southwards to Miami.

By being in Miami, the 'Cats can bring back a secured share of the money to lessen the conference's monetary losses due to probation.

It is a win-win situation. The 'Cats win by the apparent glory of rising above the ashes, win by publicity galore, and win by bringing home the loot.

Our football team, in the long run, can benefit by engaging in such a dastardly alliance. You know, winning is addictive. Once you've tasted it, you want it again and again. By rigging a couple of years of conference games, the Big Eight may be creating a monster.

Commentary

Nick Master

Guest Columnist

The monsters of Manhattan just might develop into mental giants and physically pound the opposition. We could win games long after rigging them because the 'Cats will believe they will win.

After all, who's to know these games are a setup? I'll know for sure and maybe a couple of wisenheimers. Then again, if we start mysteriously winning, then you too will know.

With all this stacked in our favor, and should the 'Cats accidentally lose a game either by illness or being absent, we can have damage-control political types on call to address the media.

Their lines would be: "It's not a loss you've seen, rather a categorical set back." Or, "In context we deny ever losing."

Florida residents can also win by having the 'Cats to town. No more tax dollars for police sting operations or vice stakeouts.

"We folks are purple and white, not red and white, officer." Shoot, we still have lingering culture shock from Shreveport, Lousiana.

This concept of sabotaging ball games for fun and profit is not a new one. It's just that no one has perfected a way to do it right. Maybe not in football, but at least Don King has got this down to a science in boxing. A strong performance by a cellar team steeped in tradition can do wonders. You never know — it could mean ABC College Football Saturday, ESPN, Geraldo, and with any luck, Time-Life Mysteries of the Universe.

Is there a down side to rigging conference games?

Naw.

For example, All-Star Wrestling has been at it for years.

Remember Sunday mornings when your dad would wake you up to see a wrestling bout before going to church? Nothing in the world could convince him it wasn't real. It's all money. A winning Wildcat team has entertainment value and dollar signs all over it. Therefore rigging football games brings on new meaning — Hey! Even new markets.

Moral victory is like living in the past. Wasn't it Einstein who said genius is 1 percent inspiration and 99 percent perspiration. How about we quit perspiring 100 percent of the time?

Editor's note: Nick Master is a Kansas State University graduate.

Support Lady Cats

Editor,

After attending most of the Lady Cats' home games this season, I decided to put in my word for them.

Where does Manhattan disappear to on Saturday nights — or any night?

It is hard for me to believe only 1,000 people (on a good night) will venture to Bramlage to cheer on the Lady Cats. That place should be half-filled with loud fans for every game.

The Lady Cats' record is the best in years. They are exciting to watch. Whether it is Mary Jo flying down the court to pop in a jumper, Nadira on a fast break after a steal, or Elise off the bench to provide an extra spark, every minute of the game is filled with action that shouldn't be missed.

Look at the intensity reflected in their faces as each basket is executed — these are women with a desire to always do their best.

Come on K-State and Manhattan, get out and support Matilda Mossman and our Lady Cats. They deserve it.

Overcrowding discussed

Candidates propose solutions at forum

By Chris Koger
Staff Writer

Five candidates running for the Manhattan School Board of Education discussed school overcrowding and possible solutions Thursday night in an open forum at Theodore Roosevelt School.

The forum, attended by about 50 parents and teachers, allowed the candidates to answer questions and present information on long- and short-term solutions to the overcrowding problem.

Graham Rose, a Manhattan pediatrician and candidate, said the overcrowding problem is evident.

"When we have Roosevelt sixth graders attending Lee (School) because there isn't enough room, something needs to be done," he said.

Rose and the four other candidates stressed the importance of the 30-member Core Committee established last year to address school overcrowding.

"This committee is important — we need to know what community members and parents think should be done," he said.

Beverly Eversmeyer, a board member and the director of guidance at the high school, said time is the main problem with overcrowding.

"It's going to be 3 or 4 years down the road before any construction will be finished," Eversmeyer said. "We have to decide what to do first and then proceed from there.

"We have classes filled to capacity and more, and dealing with it right now is important."

If the district decided to build, a possible tax levy may be required, said board member Martha Miller. Any solution imposing tax burden on residents would receive some opposition.

"(The board) has to consider the needs of county and city residents, and we can't just expect them to vote for a mill levy, especially if we're going up against other levy proposals," she said.

The candidates discussed options to alleviate the problem, including the possible use of non-school buildings and the purchase of mobile units for classroom use.

Roger Reitz, one of the three board members running for re-election, said mobile classrooms would cost about $40,000.

"I personally think we need something that is more of a long-term solution," he said. "(The board members) have to be cautious about what we decide, because it will involve all students."

Meryl Wilson, a Manhattan attorney and school board candidate, said the trailer concept may be needed because other proposals aren't feasible.

"Another idea would be to use the Robinson Education Center and convert it into classroom space," Wilson said.

The Robinson Education Center, which is located across the street from the high school, houses the district offices.

Candidates responded to instituting a year-round school schedule, which would stagger classes throughout the year and eliminate empty classrooms during the summer break.

All candidates except Miller said they opposed the year-round schedule.

"This is a dead issue as far as I'm concerned," Reitz said. "We talked about it last year, and there is no use for it."

Miller said she would support the year-round schedule if teachers, students and parents expressed the need for it.

"I agree that it doesn't seem like a good idea, but I would have to support it if enough people wanted to go to the full-year schedule," she said.

The candidates responded to the issue of curriculum changes in the schools. Three candidates said the retention of core classes should be stressed.

"I don't think we need to increase the requirements," Wilson said. "Students are having enough problems already, and increasing the variety of subjects adds to the problem."

Eversmeyer and Miller said they support elective classes stressing the arts and critical thinking.

"I'm interested in keeping different types of classes for all students, not just vocational classes for those who plan to get jobs out of high school or other classes designed for possible college students," Eversmeyer said.

College transition aided by high school workshop

By Lance Schwulst
Collegian Reporter

The transition from high school to college could be easier if students would learn better communication and study skills, according to participants in the K-State Principal, Counselor, Student Workshop.

"The thing that I hear the most consistantly from the students is the need for better communication skills," said Gary Hennigh, Colby High School counselor.

Hennigh was one of 260 representatives from Kansas high schools who attended the 36th annual workshop Wednesday and Thursday.

Hennigh and other counselors agreed that the students they see provide information that might potentially make the transition from high school to college easier for high school seniors.

"I had one of my former students come up to me and say, 'I finally realized I had to study. It was a rude awakening,'" said Linda Joel, Troy High School counselor.

"These meetings with the students tells us which programs are more meaningful and others which we may want to consider at the high school level," Hennigh said. "I also hear things that K-State could do to make the transition (to college) easier."

William Feyerharm, associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, moderated informal discussion groups with the counselors Wednesday afternoon.

"The subject of foreign language-speaking teachers in the sciences seems to come up every year," Feyerharm said. "This isn't just a K-State concern, it's a nation-wide phenomenon."

Several counselors said some students had aired complaints regarding an inability to understand instructors in science labs.

"This dialogue allows us to respond to one another and find out if we are fullfilling the personal needs of the students," said Barbara Dawes, assistant director of admissions. "It's also good public relations for K-State across Kansas."

Lawyers for North fear unfair trial

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court lifted its stay delaying the start of Oliver North's trial Thursday, but North's lawyers complained he cannot get a fair trial under a deal struck by his prosecutor and the attorney general for handling testimony involving national secrets.

"Defendant North still faces two governments, rather than a single prosecutor with full power to make all trial decisions," said Brendan Sullivan, the head of North's defense team, in papers filed with U.S. District Judge Gerhard A. Gesell.

The Supreme Court, meanwhile, lifted a stay that had been requested by Attorney General Dick Thornburgh while he was still arguing with independent counsel Lawrence Walsh over whether rules on disclosing classified information were tight enough.

U.S. Marine hostage still alive

By The Associated Press

TYRE, Lebanon — A Shiite Moslem leader said U.S. Marine Lt. Col. William R. Higgins, abducted a year ago Friday while serving as a U.N. observer, is alive despite his captors' statement that he was sentenced to death as a spy.

"He'll be released eventually" by the pro-Iranian Shiite extremists who seized him, said Abdul Majid Saleh, political officer of the Amal militia in this ancient port 50 miles south of Beirut.

Higgins, from Danville, Ky., commanded a 76-man U.N. observer group monitoring the Lebanon-Israel border. He was kidnapped by gunmen who stopped his car, 20 minutes after he had met with Saleh, on the highway south of Tyre.

Saleh would not say how he knew Higgins had not been killed by the Organization of the Oppressed on Earth, which claimed responsibility for the abduction.

His militia claims to have undercover agents who track hostage developments. The moderate Shiite movement, backed by Syria, opposes the pro-Iranian fundamentalist Shiites who hold most of the 15 Westerners missing in Lebanon.

Amal and the militia Hezbollah, believed to be an umbrella group for those holding hostages, were at war for months and nearly 600 people were killed. They reached a peace agreement in January with mediation by Syria and Iran.

Militia officials and other sources interviewed in south Lebanon shed new light on Higgins' abduction near Tyre on Feb. 17, 1988. His 44th birthday was Jan. 19.

A security source told The Associated Press that members of Amal tried to rescue Higgins three days after he was kidnapped, but were overwhelmed by Hezbollah gunmen in the village of Jibcheet.

He said 15 Amal fighters "infiltrated Jibcheet the night of Feb. 20 last year and surrounded the house where Higgins was being held. A dozen gunmen were guarding Higgins, but Amal was determined to set him free.

"A few shots were fired, after which about 200 Hezbollahis surrounded the Amal men and disarmed them. A golden opportunity to release Higgins was lost."

No independent confirmation of the report was available, but Amal did make a considerable effort to find Higgins. Angered that he was kidnapped in territory it considered its turf, the militia launched a dragnet and rounded up scores of Hezbollah activists.

Journalism contest today

By The Collegian Staff

The Kansas Scholastic Press Association is sponsoring a journalism competition for area high school students today at K-State and the University of Kansas.

"It is a statewide organization of (high) schools that have journalism programs," said Charles Fair, associate professor of journalism and mass communications.

Fair and Gloria Freeland, assistant professor of journalism and mass communications, are co-directors of the competition this year.

"(The students) are competing as individuals, but are representing their schools as well," Fair said.

More than 550 students from 28 different schools will compete in the statewide competition, he said.

Pittsburg State University, Wichita State University, the University of Kansas and K-State are arranged to cover the four main regional areas, Fair said. The schools range from 1A to 6A in size.

"Basically, (it includes) all the skills it takes to put together yearbooks and newspapers," said Fair about the competition. It includes categories for news and feature writing, page design, photography, headlines, cutlines and writing advertising copy.

Twenty students from Manhattan High School will be competing in the competition, with at least two entries in each category, said Penny Wika, publications advisor for the yearbook and newspaper at Manhattan High School.

"This is their chance to test their skills against other high school students," Wika said.

"It is always interesting to see who qualifies," she said. Some students do better on the competition level than others, Wika said.

Because Manhattan High School has a weekly school newspaper, students have more of an opportunity to improve their writing skills, which helps them in the writing competitions, she said.

First-place students in each category will go to the state competition April 27 at KU, Fair said.

Fair said the objective of the program is "to encourage good students to excell and gain opportunities in the area of journalism in college." It is designed to encourage students to become interested or seek a career in journalism and mass communications.

The second objective of the competition is for students to see K-State and get a taste of college life while they are here, he said.

This is the 14th time, in the 18 years of the contest, that it will be held at K-State, Fair said.

Judges for the competition include members of the Manhattan Mercury staff, University instructors and other professionals from Manhattan, he said.

UPC sponsors trip to Chicago this weekend for 48 students

By Paige Gantz
Collegian Reporter

The Union Program Council Travel Committee is sponsoring its first trip to Chicago this weekend.

"We've never done a trip before, so we had no idea on how many spots to reserve," said Mike Penner, graduate student in student counseling and personal services and adviser to the committee.

"We held an information meeting Jan. 24, and over 60 people attended it," he said. "Sign up began on (Jan. 25) and we filled up our 24 spots in an hour."

Penner said that originally the committee thought it would be able to sell 24 spots, so it began to create a waiting list of more than 50 people.

"We feel that this Chicago trip was popular because of the frequent amount of trips that student clubs have been making there," Penner said. "It's also close by and the cheap airline flights help."

The original package cost $95, which included air transportation from Kansas City to Chicago.

Students are responsible for their own transportation to Kansas City, Penner said. Once they reach Chicago, they are again responsible for getting themselves to the Oxford House Hotel, where the group is staying.

"We provide everyone with an information sheet and a map. Once you're there, you're on your own," Penner said. "We feel this gives people flexibility in doing what they want and when they want to do it."

Forty-nine people are participating in the trip.

"We had to see if more tickets or rooms were available," Penner said. "Unfortunately we discovered that there were not any more airline tickets available for that price or on that flight."

He said the committee did find another airline that would fly to Chicago for only $10 more.

"We discovered this on (Jan. 27), so we began calling people on the waiting list," Penner said. "We ran into the problem of needing people's money and signed contracts by the following Monday."

Working with the waiting list, Penner said the committee was able to find 24 more people who agreed to the trip even with the higher package price of $105.

"We have to limit the number of people going because we want to have a responsible group," Penner said.

Accompanying the group will be two UPC sponsors — an adviser to the UPC program and a student who is on the UPC Travel Committee.

Julie Shtogren, junior in interior design, is going on this trip with a friend.

"I spent my spring break there last year and now I love the city," Shtogren said. "Visiting the art institutes, enjoying great dining or just watching the hustle and bustle of people moving around the city intrigues me."

Proposed Medicaid expansion to increase aid

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A coalition led by the American Medical Association on Thursday proposed a sweeping overhaul of the Medicaid program to expand coverage to 11 million more poor Americans, improve benefits and raise reimbursement rates for physicians and hospitals.

The proposed expansion of the federal-state health assistance program for the poor would cost at least $13.2 billion and as much as $28 billion above current Medicaid expenditures, with most of the additional cost borne by the federal government, the coalition said.

In fiscal 1988, the federal government spent $30.5 billion and the states spent $20.5 billion on Medicaid, but fewer than half of the 33 million Americans with incomes below the federal poverty line are enrolled in the program, the coalition said.

"We call for a system that truly cares for the needs of the poor," said James R. Tallon Jr., majority leader of the New York State Assembly and chairman of the coalition's committee on Medicaid.

To pay for the program, "new revenues will have to be developed ... This is going to cost the government more money," Tallon said.

The plan was proposed by the Health Policy Agenda for the American People, a coalition organized in 1982 by the AMA to help develop health policy. The AMA pays for most of the work of the coalition, which is comprised of 172 groups representing business, labor, consumers, the elderly, children and health-care providers.

A major problem with Medicaid, the coalition's report said, is the absence of national standards. Eligibility varies from state to state, as do many of the services Medicaid covers.

"For example, a family of three living in Utah can earn $8,316 and qualify for Medicaid; but if the same family moves to Alabama, where the income eligibility criterion is $1,416, it will be denied Medicaid benefits," the report said.

The federal government requires states to provide Medicaid coverage to those on state-managed public assistance, primarily Aid to Families with Dependent Children, for which states determine eligibility.

As health care costs have accelerated, states have contained their own Medicaid costs by restricting eligibility for AFDC programs, thus limiting the number of people covered and reducing state matching obligations.

As a result, the average income threshold for AFDC eligibility in 1988 was $4,792 gross annual income for a family of three — 49 percent of the federal poverty level of $9,690, the report said.

The coalition proposes to:

- Establish national standards and a standard benefits package required to be provided by each state.
- Set income eligibility for the program at no less than the federal poverty level, and require eligibility for those with incomes above the poverty level who have extraordinary medical costs. Those changes would extend coverage to an additional 11 million people.
- Raise reimbursement rates for physicians and hospitals at least to the level of Medicare rates, which average 50 percent higher.

Reimbursement rates have dropped so low that at least a quarter of the nation's physicians don't treat Medicaid patients. Raising rates would "encourage greater participation by health-care providers and more frequent, appropriate visits by patients to physicians' offices for preventive care," the group said.

Currently, health care for an estimated 35 million people who are not covered by Medicaid or private insurance is provided often in emergency rooms, a more expensive setting than doctors' offices. The hospitals, in turn, must absorb the cost or pass it along to paying patients.

Expanding eligibility to include 11 million new recipients would cost an additional $9 billion, but the coalition offsets that figure with $6.7 billion in savings for a net cost of $2.3 billion. About $4.2 billion savings would accrue to state and local governments and health-care providers who now pay some of the medical costs for these uninsured people and $2.5 billion would be saved by the poor themselves.

Micaela, portrayed by Jean Sloop, and Don Jose, portrayed by Mitch Piper, sing the duet, "Memories of Home." The opera "Carmen" is being presented at McCain Auditorium tonight and Saturday at 8 p.m.

'Carmen'

Opera challenges cast

"It is impossible to speak of the opera 'Carmen' without using superlatives; it is universally regarded as the world's favorite opera, and after working on it for all these months I have come to believe that it is nearly perfect in its construction." — Charlotte MacFarland, director

"Carmen," by Georges Bizet, one of the most widely performed operas in the world, will continue its run in Manhattan at 8 tonight and Saturday evening in McCain Auditorium.

The production features a cast of students, faculty and area children recounting Prosper Merimee's story of "Carmen," a fiery spirited and fiercely independent soul.

"It's very nice to work with a student-faculty mixture," said MacFarland, instructor of speech and director of the opera.

"It was a little difficult at the beginning, though, because many of the students were working for the first time with faculty members, and didn't know what to expect," MacFarland said.

"Working with faculty members, in this case, has been a very solid experience for everyone involved. The work habits of the faculty members are a nice example for everyone else and set a nice tone," she said. "The students are also great in this group, they have a wonderful attitude."

This was not the only challenge in the production. The vocally demanding roles of Carmen and Don Jose required double casting.

Jennifer Edwards, instructor of music, plays Carmen on Feb.16 and Feb. 18 and Beth Bauer, graduate in music, will play Carmen on Feb.17.

Carmen is a cigarette factory worker, whose lust for adventure, freedom, and control in her life makes her a gypsy of sorts. Her sensuality and passions are underscored by her inability to commit to one relationship.

"Carmen has no strict moral code and pursues a complex freedom. She is a thrill seeker and refuses to let anything bind her," MacFarland said. "She, in gypsy fashion, has no use for a structured or organized lifestyle."

Don Jose, played by Jerry Langenkamp, professor of music, on Feb. 16 and Feb. 18 and Mitch Piper on Feb. 17, becomes Carmen's lover. Unlike Carmen, Don Jose is a man bound by a very strict code of ethics. He is a man whose passions have been repressed and inhibited by his morally stringent upbringing.

It is Carmen who frees Don Jose's repressed passions by beginning a relationship with him. His inner fire is released and he begins to live the life of a full blooded man.

Carmen, characteristic of her beliefs, soon finds the relationship binding and rebels against the possessiveness she feels around Don Jose.

In an attempt to unshackle herself from this relationship, Carmen captures the heart of Escamillo, played by Steve Rushing, instructor of music. Escamillo's character is a hot-blooded matador, who thrives on danger and who, like Carmen, laughs at death.

Don Jose, unwilling to let Carmen free herself from their relationship, seeks to destroy her, thus setting the stage for the opera's tragic end.

The opera's depth is evident in its clear dramatic structure and music that echoes the mood of the dramatic action throughout.

"The music mirrors the character's feelings and vice versa," MacFarland said. "The music is, more importantly, a large part of the dramatic action and this is one of the greatest pieces I've ever worked on.

"On a larger scale, the opera deals with the struggle between laws and limits," she said. "For society to survive we need these laws and it would be nice, as the opera suggests, to establish a clear set of rules to live by."

Ultimately, Carmen ignores these rules and challenges death one too many times, MacFarland said.

"Carmen is one of those people doomed by their desire to live on the edge," she said. "Carmen violates every moral code and makes her own law, regardless of the consequences. She pretty much chooses her own death."

By meeting Don Jose with courage, Carmen shakes her fists at the stars and proclaims an existential freedom, MacFarland said.

"Nietzsche considered this essentially tragic to face death not in an idealistic refusal to life, but paridoxically, in full assent to it," she said. "Carmen's action is not suicidal, for Carmen loves life; it is rather something she must do to remain herself."

The final force in the opera is Don Jose, a man whose fatal vision and repressed desires compel him to abandon his moral but banal life for the dangerous world of passion, MacFarland said. He is only alive when he is with Carmen, and is doomed by his obsession to lose and destroy her and himself, she said.

The production of Carmen is being dedicated to the memory of Dr. Norma Bunton, who joined the faculty in 1954 and served as Department Chair from 1960-1985, said Harold Nichols, professor of speech and chairman of the department.

"Without Dr. Bunton's interest and support, the opera program probably wouldn't have developed to the point that it has," Nichols said.

Tickets are on sale at the Nichols Theatre Box Office and at McCain Auditorium Box Office. The cost of the tickets are $6 for students and $7 for the general public.

Lady Cats need wins to get NCAA bid

By Mike Rouse
Collegian Reporter

After playing the last three games on the road, K-State women's basketball coach Matilda Mossman had just one thought on her mind before preparing for Saturday's intrastate matchup with the University of Kansas.

"Is that game getting a lot of attention back there?" Mossman asked Wednesday night via telephone from Boulder where the Lady Cats had just suffered their third straight loss against Colorado, 87-71.

Mossman has good reason to be concerned, as the Lady Jayhawks, 11-12 overall and 3-8 in the Big Eight Conference, come in to Bramlage Coliseum for a 7:30 p.m. tipoff Saturday against K-State, 16-8 and 6-5. The Lady Cats have averaged just 856 fans at home games this season.

"To be honest, we need a bunch of wild, wooly students out there Saturday. The rowdier, the better," Mossman said. "The first fact is that we have lost only one game at home this season which should help draw students.

"What else should make it exciting is that it's a big KU-K-State rivalry."

In addition to attendance, the Lady Cats will need some more wins down the stretch to be considered for post-season play, Mossman said. K-State has just three games remaining, two at home, before the conference tournament March 4-6.

"If you look at our road trip, obviously its good to be getting back home," she said. "We need the last two wins at home and we need to win our next three to have a legitimate chance at the NCAA tournament."

K-State is coming off a tough road trip that has seem them in the midst of its worst losing streak of the year.

The Lady Cats were tied with Colorado at half-time, 37-37. But the Lady Buffs went on a 14-3 run midway through the second half to pull away.

Going into the trip, the Lady Cats were only two games behind Colorado and very much still alive in the race for the Big Eight title. But now the race for second has become a deadlock between Oklahoma State, Missouri and K-State, all at 6-5 in the conference.

"Colorado has a good team that really works well together. They are very deserving of the title," Mossman said. "Now there's a battle for second and I hope we're in that battle at the end.

"Second place is real important for us and it's important to get on a roll now and peak and play as many games as we possibly can (in the Big Eight Tournament). We need to win at least five to get us in (the NCAA Tournament)."

K-State is led by sophomore forward Nadira Hazim, who is averaging 14.9 points a game. Diana Miller is averaging 12.5 points and leads the team in rebounds with seven a game.

Despite their record, the Lady Jayhawks will put up a good battle because of the rivalry. K-State leads the over-all series 30-16, including a 74-68 Lady Cat win earlier this season in Allen Field House.

The Lady Jayhawks are led by Lisa Braddy who is averaging 14.4 points and 6.3 assists a game. Marthea McCloud leads in rebounding, averaging 8.8 a game. KU guard Shannon Bloxom can be deadly from the outside. She has made 41 three-pointers this year and is averaging 13.1 points a game.

Probable Starters

'Cats take break from Big 8 play

By Mike Goens
Sports Writer

A lot more is at stake Sunday night than state bragging rights for K-State and Wichita State University.

If there is one test that would determine if K-State will reach the NCAA Tournament this year, it could come Sunday in Wichita. Both teams have high NCAA Tournament hopes.

K-State faces one of its biggest games of the year against the Shockers at Henry Levitt Arena. The contest will be nationally televised by the USA network at 7:05 p.m.

The Shockers, with Coach Eddie Fogler in his third season, are 8-4 in the Missouri Valley Conference and 16-8 overall following a 60-57 loss to Tulsa Thursday night.

"It'll be fun," Coach Lon Kruger said of traveling to Wichita. "It's a great atmosphere down there and we're looking forward to it.

"Eddie's done a great job with that program. We know how tough that chore is going to be and we hope to go down and get the job done."

Wichita State enjoys a balanced attack with four players averaging in double figures, and six with more than nine points a game. Senior center Steve Grayer leads the way with 14 points and eight rebounds a game. Dwight Praylow and John Cooper follow with 13, and Paul Guffrovich and Dwayne Praylow chip in nine points a game. Sasha Radunovich now comes off the bench for the Shockers and averages 12 points and six rebounds a game.

K-State is coming off a tough 87-79 win over Colorado Wednesday in Boulder. K-State led for most of the game, but the Buffaloes pulled within one at 76-75 with a little more than two minutes to play. Mark Dobbins rebounded a missed free throw by Fred McCoy with 1:26 left and Steve Henson scored with 49 seconds left to give the 'Cats an 81-75 lead and seal the victory.

Leading four 'Cats in double figures, Henson scored 23 points, including 4-6 from the three-point range. He burned the Buffs for 18 of his points in the first half and hit his first four three-point shots.

McCoy added 19 points; Dobbins, 15; and Lance Simmons, 11. Dobbins made all three of his three-point attempts, and picked up the slack for LaKeith Humphrey, who made only 1-7 from the field and scored just three points.

"We know how tough that chore (Wichita State game) is going to be and we hope to go down and get the job done."
— Lon Kruger
K-State coach

Colorado was topped by its Hutchinson junior college connection of Shaun Vandiver and Reggie Morton. Vandiver led the Buffaloes with 23 points and Morton hit for a season-high 21 points.

The victory was K-State's third conference road win and first since beating Kansas 71-70 on Jan. 28 in Allen Field House. The Wildcats now stand 15-7 overall and 6-4 in the Big Eight.

Probable Starters

K-State (15-7)	Pos.	WSU(16-8)
Dobbins(6-5, Sr.)	F	Cooper(6-5, So.)
Simmons(6-5, Jr.)	F	DwiPraylow(6-5, Sr.)
McCoy(6-7, Sr.)	C	Grayer(6-8, Sr.)
Henson(6-1, Jr.)	G	DwaPraylow(6-5, Sr.)
Humphrey(6-1, Jr.)	G	Guffrovich(6-1, So.)

Meet to feature about 500 athletes

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

With one week left before the Big Eight Conference Indoor Championships, the Wildcat track squad will be using Saturday's KSU Open as a final tune-up meet in preparation.

The meet, which K-State coach John Capriotti said is expected to draw about 500 athletes, will begin with field events at 9 a.m. in Ahearn Field House, followed by the running events at noon.

Nebraska, the defending Big Eight champions, will be competing Saturday along with league foes Kansas and Oklahoma State, to give Capriotti a bit of a preview of what the Big Eight meet will have in store next weekend in Lincoln, Neb. Also competing at the KSU Open Saturday will be most of the Kansas junior colleges.

"The turnout is going to be bigger than what we really wanted," Capriotti said. "But the competition is going to be really good and it will be a good tune-up for the Big Eight meet.

"It will also be a good tune-up for the junior colleges because their regional meets are coming up. Having the junior colleges here is also a good recruiting tool for us."

As usual, Capriotti will again be looking for some more K-State athletes to qualify for the NCAA Indoor Championships March 10-11 at Indianapolis. The Wildcats have already qualified five athletes for the national meet: Dan O'Mara in the shot put, Markeya Jones in the 200-meter dash, Kim Kilpatrick in the 55-meter hurdles, Ray Hill in the 55 meters and Connie Teaberry in the high jump.

"I look for a few more to qualify, maybe," Capriotti said. "DeDe Henderson has been looking real good in the high jump and she has a chance, and in the men's long jump Clifton Etheridge has been running well. Maybe some distance runners, too, like David Warders and Pat Hessini in the mile."

So far in the indoor season, Capriotti has been pleased with the progress both squads have made, but noted that K-State is a much better outdoor than indoor team.

"I think we've done a good job so far," he said. "We have been missing some key people in the middle distances on our women's team due to injuries, but I still think that both teams are pretty much right where I thought we would be — in the middle of the conference."

Questionable for this weekend is K-State 3,000-meter specialist Janet Haskin, who has been bothered by what Capriotti thinks is a touch of bursitis in her foot. Haskin delivered an impressive performance last week, winning the 3,000 meters at the Husker Invitational with a meet-record time of 9:31.98 minutes.

Also questionable is sprinter Jeff Reynolds, who has been suffering from illness and will probably be held out until the Big Eight meet. Reynolds is the defending conference champion in the 600 meters.

Baseball team to open season

By Mike Goens
Sports Writer

Weather permitting, a doubleheader against Friends University at 1 p.m. Saturday at Frank Myers Field will open the K-State spring baseball season.

Coach Mike Clark enters his third season at the helm of the Wildcats after leading the 'Cats to a 38-24 record last season.

"We're ready to play a game," Clark said. "The infield is in good shape; we've had it covered by the tarp.

"We need to play, it's tough just practicing. The kids are drilled out."

Clark said the Wildcats have been hindered by the weather the last couple of weeks. The team started practices on Jan. 16, and the favorable weather allowed it to have several intrasquad games. The team had been practicing game situations, but the cold weather forced the 'Cats inside Brandeberry Complex for practice every day to concentrate on drills.

"We go to practice every Sunday and come home and watch Arizona or someone playing games," Clark said. "You look at the top 25 and see teams that have already played 11 games."

Clark hasn't decided on the starters for Saturday's twin bill, but Jeff Peterson, David Hierholzer and Jim Haller will all pitch.

Friends finished first in the Kansas Collegiate Athletic Conference last year with a record of 16-4.

Frank Myers Field underwent renovations during the off season and will now seat 5,000 fans.

Tennis squad at SW Missouri for 3 duals Saturday, Sunday

By Carolyn Holcroft
Staff Writer

The women's tennis team will look to continue its early season success this weekend as it travels to Springfield Missouri's Sunshine Tennis Center for three dual matches against Arkansas-Little Rock, Southern Illinois-Edwardsville and Southwest Missouri State.

Coach Steve Bietau expects strong competition from all three schools, even though the Wildcats haven't competed with either Southwest Missouri or Arkansas in the past.

One interesting aspect involved is that the Arkansas head coach, Paul Kostin, was K-State sophomore Theresa Burcham's coach in high school. It was Kostin who originally introduced Bietau to Burcham, and consequently led to her coming to K-State.

"Paul historically has very strong teams. I expect to have very good competition," Bietau said.

The Wildcat coach also expects Southwest Missouri to have a good line-up. "I think their top four are very good players."

Some stiff opposition is also expected from Southern Illinois. As in last week's duel against Texas Tech, the Wildcat netters are looking to avenge some past losses to the Salukis. The last time the Wildcats faced SIU, K-State lost, 7-2.

"Southern Illinois would be a little like Texas Tech in that we played them two years ago," Bietau said. "They traditionally have one of the better Division II programs in the country."

Bietau also expects endurance to be a factor. Adding the time involved for travel to an already full schedule, the weekend could prove to be somewhat grueling for the K-State squad.

Saturday's line-up for the Wildcats will tentatively be the same as last week. However, some minor injuries may cause a change in the lineup. Burcham has been bothered by a sore knee and sickness during the week.

Marijke Nel will be at the No. 1 singles spot, followed by Helen Scheldknecht, Sara Hancock, Valerie Rive, Burcham and Annika Emtell at Nos. 2-6, respectively. Nel and Rive will head the doubles line-up, with Scheldknecht and Miste Bitner at No. 2. The No. 3 doubles team will again be Burcham and Hancock. Also traveling with the team will be

LA pitcher signs for $7.9 million

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Orel Hershiser capped a record-setting season with a record-setting contract Thursday, agreeing to a three-year, $7.9 million deal with the Los Angeles Dodgers that makes him the highest-paid player in baseball history and the sport's first $3 million man.

Hershiser, the National League Cy Young Award winner last year and the most valuable player in the NL playoffs and World Series, will receive a $1.1 million signing bonus, $2.4 million this season, $1.6 million in 1990 and $2.8 million in 1991.

"This contract is historic in its nature," Los Angeles general manager Fred Claire said.

The 30-year-old right-hander's deal with the Dodgers set several records:

■ Including a prorated share of the $1.1 million signing bonus, Hershiser will make $2,766,667 this season, the highest salary of any player, topping the $2,466,667 of Baltimore's Cal Ripken.

■ Hershiser's raise of $1,666,667 broke the record of $1,326,442 set on Feb. 1 by Toronto's Jimmy Key.

■ Hershiser's average annual salary of $2,633,333 broke the record of $2.5 million set Wednesday by Boston right-hander Roger Clemens.

■ Hershiser would get $3,166,667 in 1991, including a prorated share of the signing bonus, making him the first $3 million baseball player unless someone beats him to it in 1990.

home pay is less than $63,000.

Athletic Director Steve Miller asked Student Senate to make an "investment in excellence" by approving a bill to send a proposed athletic fee to referendum. He said 6,000 students have already given their support by purchasing season basketball tickets.

He said the athletic department could be as much as $680,000 "in the red" by the end of the year.

The proposed fee would give students free admission to all non-revenue events and place a cap on ticket prices of football and basketball season tickets.

Senate also approved the appointments to Student Tribunal and Student Review Board, which are part of the judicial branch of student government.

Other business included the approval of three special allocations, including a $1,570 increase in the Student Governing Association's printing budget that will help cover increased costs of the recently purchased copy machine. Funds of $894 were approved for an SGA trip to Washington, D.C., by the student body president and Student Senate chairman to represent K-State educational concerns to Congressmen. An $85 allocation was also approved for the Consumer Relations Board to purchase a reference book giving yearly updates on consumer laws.

the letters sent by admissions is the application students must fill out and have verified by the students' counselors.

Also enclosed with the letters are Declaration of Intent cards, by which students will indicate their intent to attend K-State, he said. The returned cards will give Lapping a better indication of the number who will actually enroll.

A weighted GPA, class ranking and ACT or SAT scores are all evaluated in the application.

"A straight GPA won't tell you as much about a student as a weighted GPA," Lapping said. "Someone can have a 3.5, but the classes they took were all fluff. We're convinced by getting a solid academic portrait, we'll have as good a student as any."

Enrollment caps already exist within the college for second-year students entering the the professional programs of architecture, landscape architecture and interior architecture. The proposed cap of 225 is for first-year students.

Cheryl Ninemire, junior in architecture and Design Council president, said students she has been in contact with approve of the caps.

"From what I understand, the enrollment cap is necessary to keep the student-to-teacher ratios low," she said.

Lapping said first-year classes now have a student-to-teacher ratio of 1-to-18. The national norm is 1-to-13.5. K-State's ratio is the second worst among accredited architecture schools, he said.

The current freshman class has already felt the effect of the high student-to-teacher ratio.

"(The overcrowding) has been putting a lot of pressure on the professors and (the students) haven't been getting the quality help that we should get," said Cheri Kannady, sophomore in environmental design. "If you have problems in studio, (the instructors) are teaching so many classes already that they don't have time for you. But they are really doing the best that they can."

Tony Chelz, associate professor of environmental design, said initially, many of the faculty members were opposed to the cap, but "in self-defense," the faculty realized the cap was necessary.

Tracy Parker, who could see some singles action this weekend.

Bietau also plans to make adjustments during the course of the matches because of the stress involved in playing three dual matches in a short span of time.

"The second reason is that Miste Bitner is real close to being in the singles line-up, and Annika Emtell is close to being in the doubles line-up," he said. "I would like to get a look at them in competition, so I would expect that sometime during the weekend they're going to be in there."

Bietau said it is not imperative that the line-up be concrete early in the season.

"Typically, what happens as you go through the season is that things begin to set themselves," he explained. "It usually becomes pretty obvious, as time goes on, who is going to do what. We're just trying to keep things in perspective."

Although the main objective is to win each match, the team also tries to find certain aspects to emphasize each week in practice.

"We're really trying to stress that each player and each doubles team make as much progress as they can on a weekly basis throughout the season," Bietau said. "If we can do this well, I think we've got a good chance to be successful."

The weekend opens against Southern Illinois Saturday morning, after which the Wildcats will face Southwest Missouri in the afternoon. The competition will be concluded Sunday morning against Arkansas.

Ken Bayles, graduate in biology, studies bacteria DNA in his Ackert Hall lab. Bayles will not know if he is accepted into the program until Jan. 1, 1990.

Student's condition upgraded

By Alan Wilds
Staff Writer

Three days after falling from the sixth floor of Marlatt Hall, the condition of Hai Quach, freshmen undeclared, has been upgraded from critical to serious, according to officials at Stormont-Vail Regional Medical Center in Topeka.

A hospital spokesman said Quach suffered head injuries and multiple fractures and remains in the hospital's intensive care unit. Officials said there was no indication of spinal injuries and it is too early to speculate on how successful his recovery will be.

"It has been a long busy weekend, but a routine one for student life."
—Pat Bosco
Dean of Student Life

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said University officials moved quickly to secure medical attention for Quach and to notify his relatives.

"In this case we were also very sensitive to his twin brother (Son Quach)," Bosco said.

Son Quach was not with his brother at the time of the incident. Bosco said Son was not located immediately because his 9:30 class had been cancelled, and although he is employed at Kramer Food Center, Son was not scheduled to work the day of the incident.

"It was through a combined effort with housing that we were able to locate him Thursday afternoon," Bosco said.

Susan Scott, associate dean of student life, said she went to Stormont-Vail Thursday afternoon and visited with the family on Friday.

Bosco said there are always precautions the University community takes "very seriously" in situations such as this. He said the Rev. Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities, met with the students and staff of Marlatt after the incident.

"We follow up very aggressively," Bosco said. "It has been a long busy weekend, but a routine one for student life."

Sgt. Andy Amaro of the K-State police department said it has still not been determined whether Quach fell or jumped out of the window.

Graduate applies to NASA's astronaut school

By Bryan Ackley
Collegian Reporter

Ken Bayles, BioServe graduate fellow, is planning a career in biological research, and if he has anything to say about it, he'll be working in space.

The K-State Division of Biology BioServe Space Technologies program sent a six-man BioServe team to Johnson Space Center in Houston in November to conduct biological research in micro-gravity conditions, Bayles said.

Bayles was a member of the team and has applied for admission into NASA's astronaut training school.

"(NASA's) application process is very straightforward. It wants to see your credentials and what kind of flight experience you've had," he said.

"I felt like a tourist when we were (at Johnson Space Center), but I guess we were in areas that most tourists never see," Bayles said. "At first, I didn't think it would be possible (to become an astronaut), but now that I've seen what NASA does, I think I have a good chance at it."

John Iandolo, professor of biology, supports Bayles' efforts to become an astronaut.

"I feel that his application is terrific," Iandolo said. "He's an outstanding student and he's very interested in the space program."

"The biology department here is incredible," Bayles said. "(People) keep telling me how they would love to see somebody wearing a K-State T-Shirt on the shuttle."

Bayles' lasting impression of NASA was its security and attention to details.

"The work can be boring and tedious because NASA won't put anything on the shuttle until it's sure it will work in space," he said.

Iandolo said Bayles' chances of becoming an astronaut are better than average, even if he isn't accepted the first time. His age, credentials and flight experience in microgravity experiments are factors working in his favor.

Bayles said the pre-flight physical examinations for the microgravity experiments were as interesting as the flights. He was required to sit in a pressure chamber that allowed him to experience rapid decompression similar to that experienced in an airplane traveling at an altitude of 8,000 feet.

Another test allowed him to experience hypoxia (oxygen deficiency), which causes symptoms of dizziness, sweating or fainting.

"NASA looks at the applications every two years," Bayles said. "Currently, NASA is accepting applications until July 1, 1989, but no announcement about selections will be made before January 1, 1990."

'Vomit comet' simulates zero gravity

By Bryan Ackley
Collegian Reporter

The National Aeronautics and Space Administration calls it the NASA 930, but some of its former passengers have affectionately dubbed it "the vomit comet."

The NASA 930 is a Boeing 707 which has been modified so scientists can conduct experiments and astronauts can train in zero gravity, or weightlessness, without leaving the earth's atmosphere, said Brian Spooner, professor of biology.

In 1987, K-State's Division of Biology BioServe Space Technologies program became a NASA Center for the Commercial Development of Space, and is one of three such facilities in the country performing biological research in microgravity.

Spooner was the flight crew chief of the BioServe team that flew on the NASA 930 in November. The team members included John Iandolo, professor of biology; James Guikema, associate professor of biology; and Dale Claassen, Ken Bayles and Ralph Henry, all BioServe graduate fellows.

To achieve microgravity, Spooner said the flight pattern which the pilot follows is called a parabola. While in flight, the pilot will complete four sets of 10 parabolas within about two hours.

He described the flight pattern.

The pilot takes off from an airstrip near Johnson Space Center in Houston and flies to an altitude of 26,000 feet.

He then ascends at a 45-degree angle until the plane reaches an altitude of 34,000 feet. From there, the pilot sends the plane into an 8,000-foot free-fall at a 45-degree angle, which lasts 30 seconds.

Weightlessness occurs during the 30 seconds of the free-fall.

The pilot levels the plane at 26,000 feet and begins another parabola almost immediately.

Upon reaching the apex of the climb, the roar of the plane's engines ceases and the only sound

Khomeini rejects author's apology

By The Associated Press

NICOSIA, Cyprus — Iran's Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini on Sunday rejected the apology of British writer Salman Rushdie and exhorted Moslems around the world to "send him to hell" for his novel "The Satanic Verses."

In a statement issued by the official Islamic Republic News Agency, Khomeini said the "imperialist mass media were falsely alleging that if the author repented, his execution order would be lifted. This is denied, 100 percent.

"Even if Salman Rushdie repents and becomes the most pious man of time it is incumbent on every Moslem (to) employ everything he's got, his life and wealth, to send him to hell," Khomeini was quoted as saying.

Khomeini, patriarch of the Islamic revolution, last week sentenced Rushdie to death for his novel, which Moslems say insults Islam.

But Iranian President Ali Khamenei, allied with so-called pragmatists led by parliament speaker Hashemi Rafsanjani, sought to defuse the crisis Friday by saying Rushdie's life would be spared if he apologized and repented.

Rushdie, in hiding under the guard of Scotland Yard, issued an apology Saturday.

Khomeini's latest statement appeared to leave no room for a negotiated settlement of the issue, which has put Britain's newly-restored relations with Iran in jeopardy.

A bounty of $5.2 million has been put on Rushdie's head by Iranian religious leaders since Khomeini issued the death sentence.

In his message Sunday, Khomeini also called on non-Moslems to help carry out the death sentence against Rushdie.

"If a non-Moslem becomes aware of his whereabouts and has the ability to execute him quicker than a Moslem, it is incumbent on Moslems to pay a reward or a fee in return for this action," the statement said.

Neither Khomeini's statement nor IRNA referred to the president's offer of a reprieve, reflecting a widening rift in the Iranian hierarchy over the Rushdie affair.

In London, a spokesman for the British Foreign Office said: "We heard of this report with great concern. We shall be considering carefully its implications.

"This subject will, of course, be discussed in Brussels by the Foreign Affairs Council" on Monday, when Foreign Secretary Sir Geoffrey Howe is to raise the issue, the spokesman said.

The 41-year-old Rushdie, born to a Moslem family in India, has not been seen in public since Thursday, two days after Khomeini's first decree.

In his apology issued through an agent, Rushdie said: "As author of 'The Satanic Verses' I recognize that Moslems in many parts of the world are genuinely distressed by the publication of my novel. I profoundly regret the distress that publication has occasioned to sincere followers of Islam."

Moslems say "The Satanic Verses" blasphemes their religion by portraying the prophet Mohammed's wives as prostitutes and suggesting that he wrote the Koran, the holy book of Islam, rather than receiving it directly from God.

"The Satanic Verses" is banned in Iran, India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Egypt and South Africa.

Publishers in France, West Germany, Greece and Turkey have decided not to publish the book, and some bookstore chains in the United States have pulled it from their shelves.

In New York Sunday, a spokesman said Cardinal John J. O'Connor criticized both "The Satanic Verses" and those who threaten its author, and seemed to imply Catholics should avoid reading the novel.

"He (O'Connor) encourages everyone not to dignify the publication of this work, which has been viewed by Moslems as highly sacrilegious and offensive," said Msgr. Peter Finn, a spokesman for the cardinal.

GOP seeks to ban former Klan leader

By The Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS — Newly-elected state Rep. David Duke, a former Ku Klux Klan leader, said Sunday that blacks and Jews have nothing to fear from him and scoffed at the notion he would be banned from the GOP and not be seated by the Legislature.

"I repudiate any racial or religious intolerance," Duke said at a news conference. "Any group — racial or religious — has nothing to fear from David Duke."

Duke, 38, squeezed out a 227-vote victory over homebuilder John Treen, 63, to represent a nearly all-white House district in Metairie, a suburb of New Orleans. Duke received 8,459 votes, or 50.7 percent, to Treen's 8,232, or 49.3 percent, in Saturday's election.

Duke registered as a Republican two days before qualifying for the race. After Duke's stunning success in the Jan. 21 primary, the national party sent three advisers to help his mild-mannered opponent and persuaded President Bush and former President Reagan to endorse Treen.

Duke became an international spokesman for the Klan in the 1970s as grand wizard of the Knights of the Ku Klux Klan. As a teen-ager he was photographed in a Nazi uniform.

U.S. senators, the governor and other community leaders of both parties warned that a Duke victory would ruin the state's reputation and harm already tenuous race relations.

While Duke said he was extending a hand in friendship to the Jewish community and inviting his opponents to talk with him, he did not mince words on where he stands on civil rights.

Woman gives birth on jet

LONDON — A British Airways jumbo jet set out Sunday from New Delhi with 367 passengers and arrived at Heathrow Airport with one more — a six pound baby girl who entered the world at 30,000 feet.

Rajapir Randhawa, en route to Canada to join her husband, gave birth aboard Flight 142 with the help of three doctors and the moral support of the crew and 366 other passengers.

Randhawa, seven-months' pregnant, started to go into labor two hours out of New Delhi, and seats in the economy section were quickly curtained off to form an emergency maternity area, an airline spokesman said.

London doctor S.P. Sriviatava delivered the baby while the airliner flew though Soviet airspace. Passengers cheered and clapped when they heard her first cries. The crew called her Beauty because "she is so beautiful," said flight attendant Pat Griffin.

Siberian pipeline leaks gas

MOSCOW — A pipeline in Siberia leaked a huge mushroom-shaped cloud of lethal, flammable gas that threatened two villages, but a helicopter crew exploded the cloud before it injured anyone, Pravda reported Sunday.

The Communist Party daily said the "poisonous and explosive fog" was detonated by a rescue crew in an MI8 helicopter who fired a flare pistol into it. That touched off a thunderous explosion and a fire that shot more than 300 feet into the air and measured nearly 2,000 feet in diameter, the paper said.

Pravda said no one happened to be in the vicinity of the fire, which eventually burned out itself.

The leak in the pipeline carrying pressurized propane, ethane, hexane and other light hydrocarbons from Siberia to the Volga region of central Russia took place Tuesday night, Pravda said.

When the gas, which was liquified at a pressure of 75 pounds per square inch, escaped from the pipeline, it turned into a "mushroom-shaped cloud ready to explode at any second," Pravda said.

Noticing a sharp drop in pressure, the pipeline crew shut down all compressor stations on the pipeline within 10 minutes, and the helicopter set off to look for the poisonous cloud, the paper said.

Its crew found a white fog suspended in the air 120 miles from the city of Tobolsk, which is 1,200 miles east of Moscow in western Siberia.

Arrests break KGB spy ring

ROME — Two people have been arrested in Italy on charges of procuring classified military information for the Soviet Union, including documents on a computer system being developed for NATO, news reports said Sunday.

The arrests broke a KGB spy ring seeking to acquire top-secret documents on the computer system, which would help NATO nations direct activities on the battlefield, including ground and air operations, the reports said.

Milan's Corriere Della Sera said the operation was coordinated across the Yugoslav border by KGB agents apparently working without the knowledge of the Yugoslav government. The newspaper quoted unidentified sources as saying one of the agents in Yugoslavia was a former Tass news agency correspondent in Rome.

Maine politicians find love

AUGUSTA, Maine — They met in the Maine Legislature on the Republican side of the aisle, the raven-haired representative from Auburn seated directly behind the handsome young floor leader from Bangor.

When she decided to run for Congress in 1978, they got together to map out campaign strategy. Over the years their shared interest in politics blossomed into something more.

The decade-long courtship between Rep. Olympia Snowe and Gov. John R. McKernan will culminate this week in marriage.

"What holds our relationship together is the fact that we love politics," said Snowe, now in her sixth term in Congress. "For some, that becomes a dividing factor, but in our case that obviously hasn't been the situation."

McKernan, a former two-term congressman, was elected governor in 1986.

The wedding Friday at the Greek Orthodox Church of the Holy Trinity in Lewiston — Snowe is of Greek descent — will begin the second marriage for both.

Orchestra ends longest strike

BALTIMORE — Members of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra return to the concert hall this week after ratifying a contract that assures a minimum $1,040 a week in the 1991-1992 season and closes the longest strike in American symphony history.

By the end of the four-year, $4.6 million contract, players will earn 35 percent more than the $770 weekly minimum they received at the end of the three-year pact that expired in September. Unlike many orchestras, the musicians in the Baltimore Symphony are paid for a 52-week year.

The contract was approved late Saturday by a vote of 78-7.

"We think it's an excellent settlement and it meets the players' needs for parity with the orchestras of St. Louis and Cincinnati," said Charles Underwood, the players' representative in negotiations. He referred to the musicians' demand that their wages be on a par with those of orchestras they consider peers.

Hudson's lover wonders why

LOS ANGELES — In the aftermath of a landmark, $21.75 million jury award, Marc Christian thinks about his former lover, Rock Hudson, and the question that haunts him still: "Why did he do it?"

Why did Hudson hide from Christian the secret that went to bed with them for eight months: that the movie star had AIDS?

"I don't know why he did it," Christian reflected. "He took that to the grave with him. I don't know if he just couldn't face the fact that he was dying. A lot of people don't believe in their mortality when they're famous. You see your image up there on the screen and maybe he thought he would live forever."

Or maybe, he said, Hudson was used to having others handle his problems.

"He had been a star since he was 23. Everything in his life was delegated," Christian said in an interview. "I think he had some help in making the decision not to tell me. But even if others were trying to influence him, he should have been man enough to tell me."

Christian, 35, who sued Hudson's estate and secretary for emotional distress, was awarded $14.5 million Wednesday and an additional $7.25 million in punitive damages Friday.

Traffic fatalities not rising despite increase in speed

By Mindy Robert
Collegian Reporter

Although fatalities on rural interstate highways across the nation increased where the speed limit was raised to 65 mph, Kansas is not expected to have the same fatality increase.

"In Kansas, we have not seen an increase in traffic fatalities on rural interstate highways," said Patrice Pomeroy, public information assistant of the Kansas Department of Transportation.

The first rural interstates posted the 65 mph speed limit on May 14, 1987, Pomeroy said. Nineteen fatal accidents occurred in 1987 with 26 people killed.

From January to June, seven fatal accidents occurred with 10 people killed, she said. To estimate the total number of fatalities during 1988, the first-half figure should be doubled. The 1988 estimate is 14 fatal accidents, a decrease from 1987.

Nine fatal accidents occurred in 1986 with 10 people killed on rural interstates in Kansas, she said. In 1985, 23 fatal accidents occurred with 24 people killed.

"The 1986 figures just happened to be down," Pomeroy said. "There is nothing we can point to as to why."

A report issued to Congress by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration showed a 19 percent national increase in fatalities from 1986 to 1987 in states which raised the speed limit. In the 38 states that raised the speed limit to 65 mph, fatalities increased from 1,839 in 1986 to 2,191 in 1987.

A spokesperson for the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration said the figures are raw figures, and the 1987 figure included those fatalities before the 65 mph speed limit went into effect.

Pomeroy said the cause of the increase in fatalities was difficult to speculate.

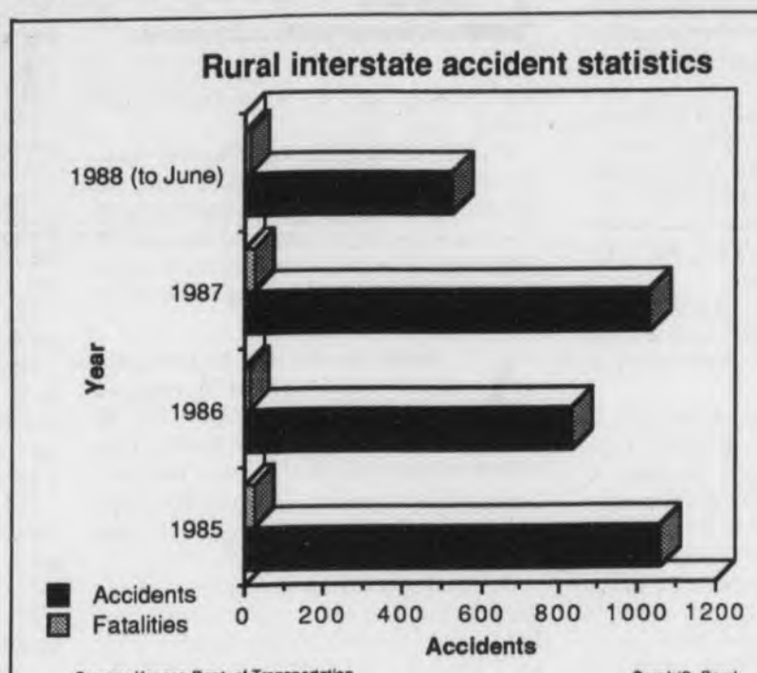
"You can't attribute accidents to one thing," she said. "What you have to look at on any accident is that there is more than one factor involved."

Weather, road conditions and the drivers' impairment are all factors, Pomeroy said.

"(The rural interstates) are the best highways in the state," she said. "They are built with safety features."

In Kansas, 772 miles of rural interstate highways are posted at 65 mph, Pomeroy said.

The speed limit is 65 mph on Interstates 35, 70, 135 and 335, said Mark Goodloe, highway patrolman with research and planning of the Kansas Highway Patrol in Topeka. Other 65 mph roads include sections of U.S. Highway 81, I-435 and Kansas Highway 10.



The number of speeding violations on rural interstates has decreased since the change.

In January 1987, 3,467 tickets were issued for violating the 55 mph speed limit on Kansas interstates, Goodloe said. In January 1988, 1,904 tickets were issued for violating the 65 mph speed limit.

February violations numbered 1,433 more in 1987 than in 1988.

Weather and increased enforcement along with drivers being "satisfied with driving 65 mph instead of 55 mph" could account for the decrease in the number of speeding violations on rural interstate highways, Goodloe said.

The transportation department checked the average speed of motorists in 23 locations in Kansas, Pomeroy said.

Guard prevents accidents, helps children cross street

By Britt Owen
Collegian Reporter

Getting kids safely across the street at the intersection of Juliette and Bluemont avenues is the responsibility of John Noland, crossing guard at Bluemont Elementary School.

Noland can be seen in an orange safety vest with a red stop sign helping children cross the street.

"I've got a great bunch of kids," said Noland, who has worked as a crossing guard for seven years.

"The most special things are what the kids tell me," he said. "Sometimes, they bring me leaves or the tooth they are going to hide under the pillow.

"There've been no accidents with my children. Occasionally, there is a minor fender-bender with the cars on the street that keeps things interesting."

Noland said he works in shifts from 8 a.m. to 9 a.m., 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. and 3 p.m. to 4 p.m.

When it is hot, Noland said there is not much one can do except stand in the shade. To keep warm in the cold months, Noland wears a ski mask and hat, insulated underwear, boots and a jumpsuit.

Noland worked as a car salesman before retiring. He said he took his present job because other than loving kids, he wanted something to regulate his hours and get him out of the house.

Noland said he will work as a crossing guard for as long as he reasonably can.

"I miss it in the summer," said Noland, who is "always anxious" to come back and see the children.

Eleven crossing guards work for the Riley County Police Department, said Sgt. K.W. Padgett.

"We have the responsibility of hiring and training the crossing guards," Padgett said.

Both men and women, ranging in age from 40 to 60, serve as crossing guards. Padgett said the pay is generally $5 an hour.

"Their job is to make sure the traffic is stopped or gets stopped to let the children cross," he said.

"Five crossings have guards there for morning, lunchtime and afternoons, while the other six only have them in the morning and afternoon," Padgett said.

College benefited by lottery

By Angie Smith
Collegian Reporter

The College of Engineering received $300,000 from Kansas Technology Enterprise Corporation to upgrade automated manfacturing equipment, said Gale Simons, associate dean of research.

Donald Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering, said the money will not only provide a research area, but also a demonstration area for robotics and manufacturing.

KTEC was established in 1987 in Topeka as a non-profit corporation funded by the state of Kansas, Simons said. KTEC receives money from the Kansas Lottery and awards it to Kansas colleges to increase the growth of high technology in Kansas.

The College of Engineering teamed with different companies in Kansas to prepare proposals designed for economic development, he said. The company provides 60 percent of the proposed money and if KTEC accepts, it provides the other 40 percent.

Osborne Industries, in Osborne, has worked with K-State on different proposals. George Eakin, a project engineer at Osborne Industries Inc., said the company has benefited from K-State's research.

"Our research projects with K-State have been very beneficial to our fundamental understanding of ventilation design and air movement," Eakin said. "Through different projects, Osborne Industries Inc. has built a long lasting relationship with K-State."

Simons said K-State is always competing with the other Kansas regents schools.

The company benefits by gaining the research knowledge developed by the College of Engineering, Simons said.

Divestment ethical in ending apartheid

As Victor Hugo once wrote, "Nothing in this world is so powerful as an idea whose time has come."

The idea of full economic sanctions against South Africa has finally arrived in full force, as evidenced by South African trade union leader Nomonde Ngubo's Lou Douglas Lecture last week.

No longer can opponents of sanctions argue that such measures will only hurt the impoverished and repressed blacks they are intended to help. Ngubo's union, the Confederation of South African Trade Unions, with a membership of more than a million black workers, has repeatedly called for sanctions during the past year.

With the people who will supposedly bear the brunt of sanctions now supporting them, what reasons could the United States possibly have for refusing to enact them, besides the protection of American investments, interests and influence?

Our new president aspires to be kinder, gentler and more ethical than his predecessor. Shouldn't this new desire for ethics supersede the unconscionable greed of corporate investment in South Africa?

Moreover, our university is supposed to be an institution of higher education that encourages its students to set high standards for themselves and for their world, and teaches that these standards must be held to and fought for. The institutionalized racism of the South African government is an appallingly low standard.

Nonetheless, an estimated $400,000 of K-State Student Foundation money is invested in corporations that do business there. These corporations are the economic pillars upon which the apartheid system rests. The only way to shake these foundations, and bring about change in South Africa, is to hit the corporations where it counts — in their accounting ledgers.

K-State must not wait for leadership from Washington on the problem of South African investment, for that wait could very well be in vain. The ethical thing — the right thing — to do is to divest student foundation money right now.

Other Perspectives

The negative cloud which has continued to loom over the image of the University of Oklahoma should have already alerted us to an undeniable fact: that a situation exists which has mushroomed from an athletic department issue into a University of Oklahoma problem.

... Now is the time to critically evaluate where we are and implement effective solutions that address the core of the matter.

Even a casual onlooker will observe immediately that the University of Oklahoma consists of a dualistic society in which athletes are at one end of the spectrum and non-athletes are at the other. This segmentation is problematic because it creates an atmosphere which fuels the fires of misconception, stereotypes and miunderstanding. Steps need to be taken to insure that our diverse student body is a cohesive one rather than a fundamentally segmented one.

Media has short attention span

Commentary

Chad L. Sanborn
Collegian Columnist

Supposedly, collective America doesn't have a long attention span. Just take a look at ... hey, I'm talking to you ... just take a look at the garbage the national media shove down our throats.

Remember about two years ago, everybody was dying from sucking down too much crack. Oh, you must have heard about it. It was strewn across all the newspapers, plastered on the covers of several national magazines and acted, reenacted and dramatized for our sensationalistic pleasure all over the visual squawk boxes.

But it would seem the spread of this horrible drug — the one that was stealing America's future — has been curbed. Maybe it was brought to a halt by the nifty new Drug Czar. (Can't you see meeting this guy: "Hi, I'm Billy Bennett, Drug Czar. Here's my card.") Or maybe it was zero tolerance.

Whatever the reason, crack is now hard to come by in the media, though I hear tell it is still easy to cop a hit in the inner city if you have a spare $10.

So if you believe the media, all the crack is gone, dried up. Incidentally, whatever happened to the world's largest supplier of cocaine, drug kingpin Gen. Manuel Noriega?

Old pock-face hasn't been in the news too much lately, either. But I don't really remember the Panamanian strong man ever being brought to justice, or being gunned down by Sandinista-armed Marxist hooligans.

Maybe he had a change of heart, or maybe he was blessed with a Nintendo home video game for Christmas. After all, that's what most bad eggs really need, just something constructive to do with their time.

Then there is the media's favorite bad egg, Col. Moammar Gadhafi. That silly towelhead is always good for a few lines of good copy.

His only noble effort was allegedly blowing up a discotheque (although he made the mistake of taking a few U.S. soldiers with it). Whether he is allegedly making icky chemicals, or just chatting with Barbara Walters, this guy spells news. If nothing much else is going on, he is.

And tell me, did they find all those children who were lost? A few years ago you couldn't pick up a milk carton without your heart aching at the picture of some bug-eyed kid who had been kidnapped by a lunatic parent who just happened to be a big-time cinematographer in the kiddie porn business.

Haven't heard too much about them recently, though. Funny, the media kept tossing out figures like, "about 2,000,000 missing children," which meant about one in four of all the little tykes in America was astray.

That meant you probably knew one or two missing children. I guess everybody turned in all the missing kids they knew to the appropriate parents, and now everyone sleeps easier.

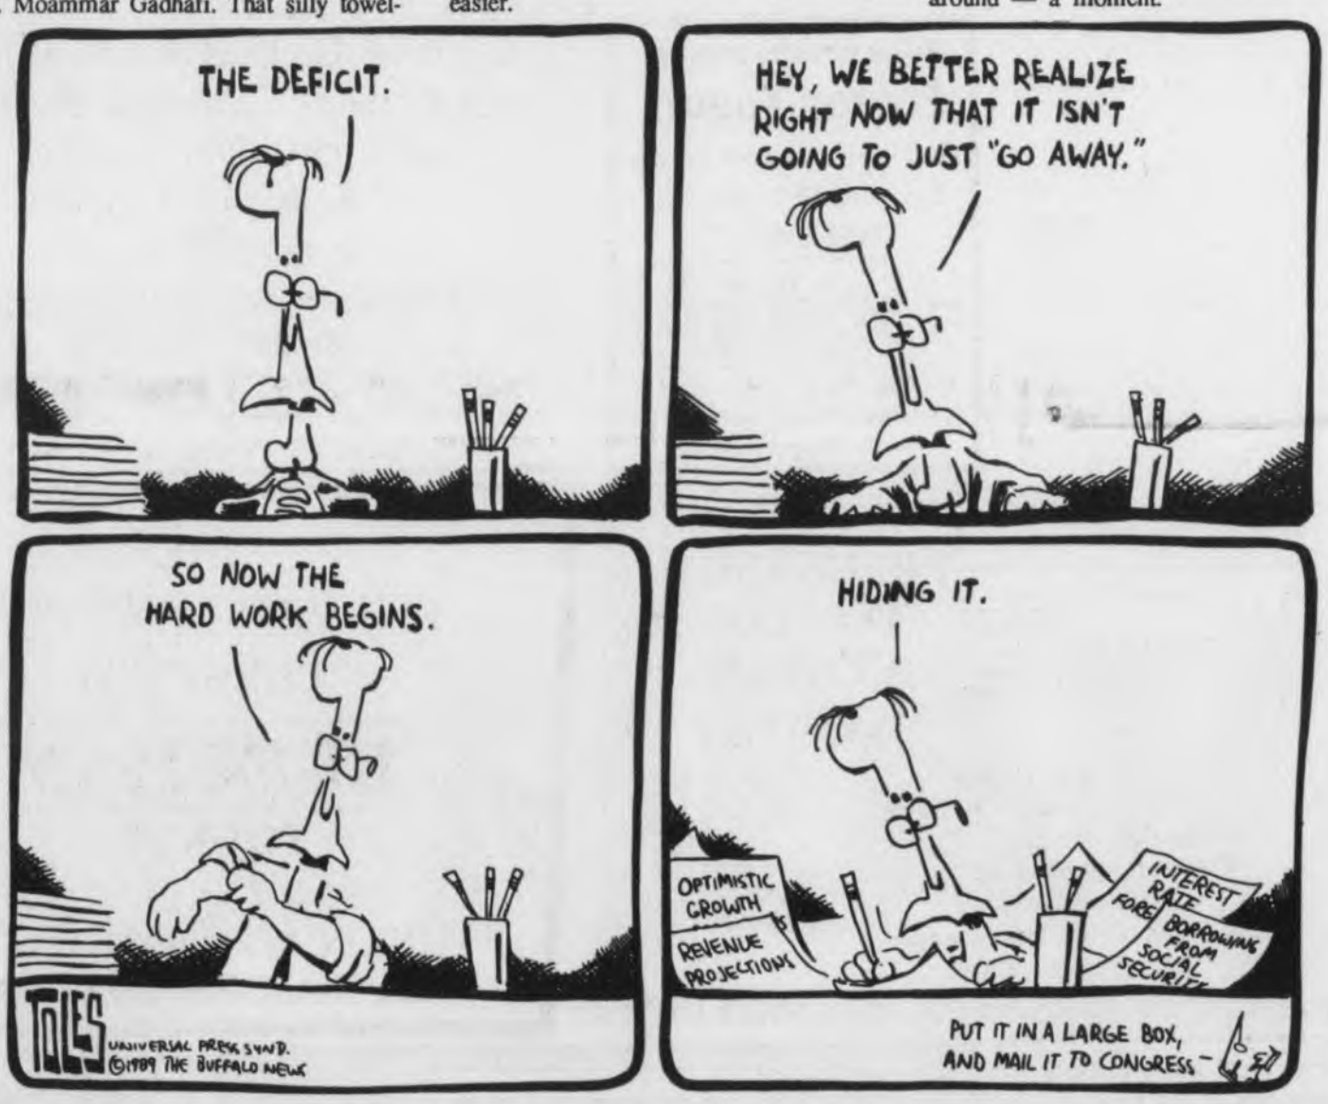
And what about sleeping, or rather, all those homeless people who were sleeping on grates and in big cardboard washer boxes?

I don't remember letting any of them move in with me, and I don't remember any of you doing such a noble yet stupid thing, either. It is almost easier to force yourself to laugh at a Garfield comic strip than it is to see the homeless through the media. But take a walk by a shelter. ...

Then there was that George Bush fella. As far as the media are concerned, the guy went from wimp to stud-muffin quicker than you can say "image consultant."

And young Danny Quayle, who used to be everbody's idiot next door, has pulled the scarecrow act. Evidently he played 36 holes against the Wizard of Oz and won a diploma and a trip to Latin America.

Oh, and who can forget: AIDS, AIDS, AIDS!



Boy, they scared the hell out of us, didn't they? Didn't really inform us too well, but man they spooked us. Hey, did they find a cure for it, because I ain't seen nothing about it recently? Wait, yes I have.

Babies born with AIDS. No, they're not missing from home and they don't smoke crack, but they will make for great short-term hype.

Uh, what's the latest? ... Oh yeah, Alzheimer's disease.

Sorry, for a moment I forgot what the latest story to be hyped and stripped of its true impact was. It's no big deal, I don't have the dang disease. I just forgot for a moment.

And that's probably all the longer the Alzheimer's story and those that follow will be around — a moment.

Persecution of author unjust

Commentary

Manjur Karim
Guest Columnist

Any serious student of history will tell us the controversy surrounding Salman Rushdie is not the first time that persecution based on the grounds of religion has ever happened.

People have been burned at stakes, Jews and others killed in the holocaust, nations stripped of their identity, teenagers killed by occupation armies, people segregated within their own country, and books banned — all in the name of an ultimate interest, an unarguable truth.

The truth may be racial purity, national security, the promised land or the often-abused assertion of God's supremacy and the infallibility of his prophets. Salman Rushdie, a brilliant author born in India who is now living in Britain, is not the lonely, but only the latest victim of this witch-hunting.

In a dream scene in his latest novel, "The Satanic Verses," Rushdie treated Mohammed, the prophet of Islam, as a mortal, with human vices and virtues. This fictional illustration is construed by many people as an insult to God's prophet.

The Ayatollah Khomeini, guru of the Iranian brand of Islamic fundamentalism, asked the "true Moslems" to kill Rushdie and the publisher of the book. An Iranian mullah offered $2 million for Rushdie's head. Violent mobs are demanding Rushdie's death in Iran, Pakistan, and India (sociologists can offer important insights on this kind of collective behavior).

Demands have been made on the Italian, British and U.S. governments to ban the novel. In the face of the threat of political instability, the governments in Pakistan and India banned the book.

Salman Rushdie, in order to protect himself from possible attacks, went into hiding. The London-based company that published "The Satanic Verses" is under police protection.

The whole event certainly involves some important questions. Are people always required to conform to the same truths that were handed down to them some 1,400 or 2,000 years ago, and hence keep on recreating the same static wheel over and over?

Or, do they have the right to challenge and question the material and epistemological "taken for granteds" they confront in their everyday social experience?

The whole tradition of critical scientific thought is obviously based on an individual's right to create, question, explore, experience and imagine. Whether one agrees with Rushdie's illustration is beside the point.

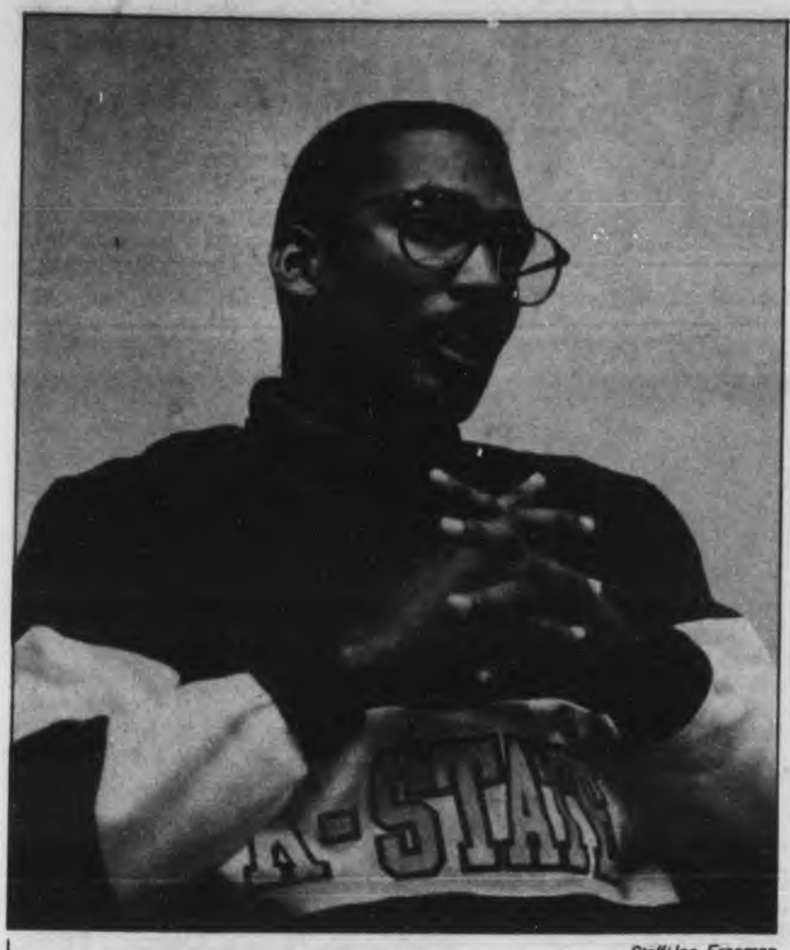
The bottom line is that he has the right to speak out. If someone refuses to read the book, he or she has every right to do that. But, no one has the right to tell other people whether they should read it, let alone express the desire to behead the author or publisher.

However, the question goes beyond the enlightenment-ignorance dichotomy. The controversy is not fundamentally theological in nature. It is something more desperate, more pragmatic.

Regardless of one's position in the ideological spectrum, one will find it hard to exaggerate the political-strategical dimension of the issue. It does not take a genius to see through the Iranian fundamentalist attempts to divert the Iranian people's attention from the catastrophic consequences of an irrational war that cost the lives of millions.

The theocracy that ruthlessly destroyed (or severely damaged) the left-liberal opposition of the country has found a new scapegoat in Salman Rushdie.

The Saudi aristocracy has found another opportunity to rationalize its self-proclaimed status as the philosopher, patriarch and guide of mainstream Islam, hence perpetuating its constant denial of the existence of such real issues as economic inequality, tribal oligarchy and political impotence.



In Pakistan, skillfully built-up mass hysteria has an obvious goal in perspective — embarrassing the democratically elected prime minister Benazir Bhutto's government. (Bhutto is not only popularly elected, but a woman, a double sin from the perspective of the fundamentalist world view.)

Salman Rushdie is not only a victim of ignorance and intolerance, but also a scapegoat of reactionary political manipulation. The liberated intelligentsia all over the world have the ethical responsibility to come to the defense of Rushdie.

Rushdie, within the context of this contemporary fundamentalist melodrama, is not only an individual author, but a symbol of the right of defiance and heresy.

Cuffy faces reality with optimism

Student Body President Laurian Cuffy

By Mindy Robert
Collegian Reporter

Growing up in Trinidad and Tobago gave Student Body President Laurian Cuffy an optimistic attitude.

"(In Trinidad) I was sheltered from the racial problems that existed in the United States," said Cuffy, senior in management. "I never got the impression being black was a battle I had to face."

The population of the island of Trinidad is 45 percent black and 45 percent native Indian. Caucasians, orientals and other groups make up the other 10 percent.

"I came to the United States and started seeing some of the apparent barriers of the 1960s and the institutional barriers that still exist right now," Cuffy said. "I always had an attitude I can do things."

Because of his attitude, he said he was able to deal with the reality he faced in the United States.

"I had an optimistic attitude all the time," Cuffy said. "The barriers are surmountable.

"Any time you get the opportunity to travel, move from one society to another society, it broadens your perspective on life and broadens your perspective as far as the world is concerned."

Cuffy was born in Trinidad and lived there prior to moving to Delaware in 1969. In 1973, he returned to Trinidad and stayed until 1979.

Cuffy attended one year of high school in the United States, after which he joined the U.S. Army. After serving four and one-half years in the Army, he was discharged from active duty and came to K-State to get his commission on an ROTC scholarship in engineering.

A decision to pursue a career in business and pre-law prompted Cuffy to leave the ROTC program and get his commission as a second lieutenant in the Army National Guard through the Officer Candidate School located in Salina.

Exposure to K-State while stationed at Fort Riley and its good study environment are reasons why Cuffy chose to attend the University, he said.

"(K-State) has an excellent study environment," he said. "It's quiet and the people are friendly. The environment is such you don't have a lot of the distractions of metropolitan areas."

After graduating in business administration, Cuffy said he would like to go to law school and eventually enter politics.

"I want to serve people and that is why I want to go into politics," Cuffy said. "My ultimate goal in life is to make a contribution to society — to leave something small behind."

Ira Bolden, Cuffy's chief of staff and junior in electrical engineering, described Cuffy as a caring individual.

"(Laurian) looks at something, sees it isn't right, and he cares enough to take actions," Bolden said. "If he sees wrongs that can be corrected, he is convicted to do that."

Cuffy said he may appear to be an extrovert, but in reality is an introvert. He said two years ago, he was a different individual.

"I would come to the University, shoot to the library, study, go to class, shoot to the library and study," he said. "That is just me. That is Laurian Cuffy.

"My goals are to be in the midst of people so I continually try to move away from the introvert nature that I have."

Bolden said underneath Cuffy's brassiness is "a very shy individual."

"He came out of his shyness because he cares," Bolden said.

Because of his involvement with Black Student Union and the Big Eight Conference on Black Student Government held at K-State, Cuffy said he got involved with the Student Governing Association and decided to run for student body president.

Cuffy was first exposed to student government when he served as Minority Affairs Director on the staff of former Student Body President Troy Lubbers.

He said conversations with associate dean of student life Susan Scott last summer and his work on a student manual concerning minority students nurtured the idea of running for student body president.

"I woke up one morning and I said 'I am going to run for this thing,'" he said.

"(Laurian) is a leader," Bolden said.

The style of leadership Cuffy said he experienced in the military is from the top down.

"It is very authoritarian," he said. "If you're in battle and you tell a sol-

'Cats shock WSU

Win at Henry Levitt Arena first in almost 25 years

From Staff and Wire Reports

WICHITA — Steve Henson scored four of his 15 points in the last 36 seconds of overtime Sunday night to lead K-State to a 73-71 victory over intrastate rival Wichita State in Henry Levitt Arena.

Henson made a 12-footer for a 71-65 advantage and added two free throws 10 seconds later to make it 73-68. The Shockers, who hit all three attempted 3-pointers in overtime, got the ball after K-State's Tony Massop traveled following an inbounds pass.

But John Cooper's turnaround 10-footer with four seconds left bounced high off the rim and into Mark Dobbins' hands.

The last time K-State won at Levitt Arena was March 14, 1964.

K-State coach Lon Kruger said it was a hard-fought victory.

"It was one of those instances where we couldn't enjoy it because it was so tight at the end," Kruger said. "But winning the game, as we did in Lawrence (against Kansas, 71-70, earlier this season), was reward enough."

Paul Guffrovich, who led the Shockers with 17 points, hit two 3-pointers in overtime, including one with 17 seconds left for the final score. He missed an 18-footer from the corner with four seconds left in regulation that could have won the game for the Shockers.

The Wildcats, who hit 21 of 26 free throws, seven of eight in overtime, last led in regulation 49-48 with 9:41 to play.

But Wichita State made just nine of 22 free throws, missing four of six during the last five minutes in regulation.

Fred McCoy led the Wildcats, 16-7 overall, with 18 points, while Billy Ray Smith added a career-high 14 off the bench, 10 in the second half.

It was the play of Smith and Massop, who had nine points, that may have pleased Kruger the most.

"They did an outstanding job and I'm really proud of their effort," Kruger said. "The hard work that both do in practice continues to pay off at key times."

Sasha Radunovich added 15 for Wichita State, 16-9. Steve Grayer scored 13 points and Cooper had 10.

Wildcats pull out a 'double-deep-dish-dilly' at WSU

Svoboda on Sports

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Columnist

If ever a gut-check stared Coach Lon Kruger's men's basketball team in the face, it was Sunday night in Wichita.

With a boisterous capacity crowd in Henry Levitt Arena all over the Wildcats for 45 minutes, and with a 25-year drought in Wichita looking as if it might reach 26, K-State responded with its biggest win since last season's victory over Purdue in the semifinals of the NCAA Midwest Regional.

The 73-71 overtime triumph was important to the Wildcats for several reasons.

First and foremost, it was a road win against a fellow "bubble" team, a win that might help the 16-7 Wildcats earn a third-straight trip to the NCAA tournament in March.

Secondly, it came in overtime. In Kruger's tenure as coach, K-State has not been very successful in games that required an extra period.

K-State's overtime record with Kruger in command entering Sunday night's extra session was 3-4. Two of those losses were to arch-rival Kansas, and no Kruger team had won an overtime game on an opponent's home floor. Two of the wins came on neutral courts and one was in Ahearn Field House.

And finally, it was a win in Wichita. K-State had not won in Wichita since March 14, 1964, a 94-86 triumph in the Midwest Regional Championship game that lifted K-State to the NCAA Final Four in Kansas City.

"This is a very, very tough place to win," Kruger said in what may have been the understatement of the year to this point.

All-in-all, it was a "double-deep-dish-dilly" and a "big, big, big, big, big, big" win all rolled up into one extremely important package.

"I'm really proud of our players," Kruger said. "They did a great job. It wasn't a real pretty ballgame, but we haven't won many pretty."

And they haven't won any more important.

The keys for K-State were several, including the return of some consistent scoring punch from the players in the frontcourt.

Fred McCoy led K-State with 18 points before fouling out late in overtime, and Billy Ray Smith added a career-high 14 points to spark the 'Cat attack. Smith was a perfect 6-of-6 from the free throw line and had 10 of his points in the second half.

Tony Massop's play inside was a key as well. Kruger played both of his centers a great deal of the game, and Massop and McCoy both had key rebounds at critical junctures.

Massop's traveling violation with eight seconds left in overtime gave Wichita State a chance to force the game into a second five-minute period, but it failed to negate a strong performance which featured Massop's usual monster dunks and blocked shots.

"Tony had a great game for us," Kruger said. "I know he's disappointed in the travel (violation) late, but what he had done to that point was very important."

What Massop and his teammates accomplished during the week was even more important. Entering the final two weeks of the regular season, K-State was facing games with Oklahoma, Missouri, Oklahoma State and Iowa State.

Had K-State not picked up wins against Colorado last Wednesday in Boulder and last night at Wichita State, the Wildcats would have found themselves needing to win their final four games to assure themselves of an NCAA berth. Now, realistically, all the Wildcats need to do is win two.

That may be tough, with Oklahoma, Missouri and Oklahoma State all having posted wins over K-State previously and with Iowa State on a tear at home of late.

But at least, after this past week, it's now a challenge Kruger's team looks at with renewed confidence.

"It was a great week for us," he said. "Two quality wins on the road, and now our guys are starting to feel a little bit better about themselves."

And it couldn't have come at a better time.

U.S. Olympic panel backs budget cuts

By The Associated Press

PORTLAND, Ore. — America's Olympic program must trim its bloated bureaucracy, spend more money on athletes, and make winning medals its primary goal.

That was the message Sunday from a U.S. Olympic Committee panel chaired by George Steinbrenner, the New York Yankees principal owner and new vice president of the USOC.

Steinbrenner shook up the USOC, to the delight of some and the resentment of others, by saying it should slash its executive board from 89 to 43 voting members and eliminate 19 of 32 committees.

"The USOC and its members to a degree have lost their unity of purpose, and need to recapture their sense of mission," the report said.

That mission, it said, is "to ensure conditions enabling American athletes the unfettered opportunity to prepare themselves to compete internationally to the maximum of their abilities."

Steinbrenner was criticized by many Olympic athletes for his "winning is everything" attitude when he was appointed last year to head the USOC Overview Commission.

Shot at buzzer sinks Wolverines

By The Associated Press

Bill Frieder wouldn't complain about the referees. Not exactly. All he would do is cast doubt.

"I'll get ripped if I say it was good because people will say I'm not standing up for my team, and I'll get ripped if I say it wasn't good because they'll say I was making excuses," Frieder said Sunday after Jay Edwards' 3-pointer at the buzzer gave ninth-ranked Indiana a 76-75 victory over No. 13 Michigan.

"I think I heard a horn while it was in the air," Edwards said. "I didn't hear it before I shot it."

Edwards never saw the ball go in. But he knew it did.

"I heard everybody scream," Edwards said. "I couldn't believe it at first. I'm just now realizing what happened."

Rumeal Robinson, who led the Wolverines with 24 points, knew immediately what had happened.

"We had the game in our hands," he said. "A referee call in a crucial game like this is what will give them the Big Ten championship."

The Hoosiers, 21-5, are 11-1 in the conference with six games remaining. Illinois is second at 8-4. Michigan, 19-6, fell into a tie with Iowa for third at 7-5.

Top 20 Roundup

No. 8 North Carolina 86, Maryland 75

Steve Bucknall scored 14 of his 16 points in the second half, including a 3-pointer with three seconds left on the shot clock that gave the Tar Heels a 73-66 lead with 1:50 remaining.

King Rice sank two free throws and converted a three-point play, and Jeff Lebo added four more points in the final 90 seconds for the Tar Heels, 22-5 overall and 8-3 in the Atlantic Coast Conference.

J.R. Reid scored 17 points for the Tar Heels. John Johnson scored 24 points for Maryland, 8-16 and 1-10.

No. 14 West Virginia 90, Rhode Island 66

Chris Brooks scored 22 points and Ray Foster 17 as the Mountaineers, 22-2 and 15-0 in the Atlantic 10, extended the nation's longest winning streak to 21 games.

John Evans scored 23 points for Rhode Island, 11-13 and 7-8, which lost its third straight. Herb Dixon scored 17, including 11 in the second half, and Kenny Green 11.

Eric Leslie, who had been leading the Rams in scoring with an average of 17.5, scored just two points.

No. 18 Nevada-Las Vegas 62, Temple 60

Greg Anthony made a game-winning, off-balance jumper with 28 seconds left as the Runnin' Rebels rallied in the final four minutes.

Temple, 15-9, led 56-53 before Anthony tied it on a 3-pointer with four minutes remaining. Anderson Hunt's 3-pointer with 3:31 left gave Nevada-Las Vegas a 59-56 lead.

Mark Macon, who scored 17 of his 27 points in the second half, made a jumper with 2:10 left, pulling Temple within one. He was fouled by Stacey Augman with 1:05 to go and made both free throws, giving Temple a 60-59 lead.

David Butler's shot was blocked in the lane, Anthony grabbed the ball, and spun around for eight-footer as he was fouled by Macon.

'Cat track teams dominate meet; place 17

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

Probably the biggest news coming from the KSU Open track meet Saturday in Ahearn Field House was the return of K-State's 400-meter specialist Jeff Reynolds.

Reynolds, who took 17th at the U.S. Olympic trials last summer, finished second with a time of 48.38 seconds.

"I wasn't sure how fast he was going to run today," K-State coach John Capriotti said of Reynolds, who had recently been bothered by an illness. "But he won his heat in the prelims and I thought he had a real good race."

Turning in another good race in the 400 meters was Reynolds' teammate, Sean Banks, who won the event in 47.6, while Corey King completed a K-State sweep in the 400 with a third-place time of 48.81.

K-State shot putter Dan O'Mara throws during the KSU Open track meet Saturday in Ahearn Field House. O'Mara placed third in the event with a toss of 60-3¾ . Seventeen 'Cats placed at the meet in preparation for the Big Eight Conference championships next Saturday.

Wildcat long jumper Clifton Etheridge also grabbed first place honors in his event with a leap of 24-5½ feet. Tyrone Watkins rounded out K-State first-place finishers in the men's division with a victory in the 300-yard dash, turning in a time of 31.08.

Shot putter Dan O'Mara saw his string of victories in his event snapped at four as he took third place with a throw of 60-3¾ . O'Mara however, has thrown farther than the national qualifying mark of 59-4¾ each time out this season.

"I thought it was a good throw for Dan," Capriotti said, "but he was disappointed."

Also turning in a stellar performance for the K-State men was Chris Samuelson, who had a season-best leap of 7-1½ in the high jump, good enough for a second-place finish. The K-State men's 1600-meter relay team finished second in 3:11.5, missing the national qualifying mark by just .08 seconds.

Also placing in the men's division for K-State was Darrell Wyatt, who took third in the 55 meters with a time of 6.43.

The women's squad had four athletes turn in first-place performances.

Carla Shannon led K-State sweep in the long jump, taking first with a leap of 18-8¼ , while Kim Richeson was second at 18-3¾ and Karen McGaughey third at 18-2½ .

Kim Kilpatrick won the 55-meter hurdles with a time of 7.7 seconds. Latricia Joyner's time of 24.99 gave her a first-place finish in the 200 meters, while Becky Ives also captured first place in the 800 meters with a 2:17.1 clocking.

Also placing for the K-State women were DeDe Henderson and Connie Teaberry, who finished second and third in the high jump going 5-9¼ and 5-7½ , respectively. Markeya Jones finished second in the 55 meters in 6.8, while Angie Miller took third in the shot put with a heave of 45-2½ . Joy Jones took third in the 400 meters with a time of 56.59 and Marge Eddy also grabbed a third place finish in the mile with a time of 5:06.9.

One NCAA record was nearly established by Kansas pole vaulter Pat Manson, who missed a try at 18-8. Manson won the event going 18-5½ .

Netters remain unbeaten

From Staff and Wire Reports

Consider K-State women's tennis coach Steve Bietau a happy man. After all, his Wildcat women are off to one of their best starts ever.

K-State dominated the quadrangular held at Springfield, Mo., this weekend going 3-0 against Southern Illinois-Edwardsville, Southwest Missouri and Arkansas-Little Rock to remain undefeated in match play.

"In terms of effort and fight, I've never had a team that produces like this one does. The players, especially in the top positions, are fighting for every point and they never give up," Bietau said.

K-State's first match against Southern Illinois-Edwardsville was the toughest match of the weekend as the Wildcats won by a narrow 5-4 margin. The next match, against Southwest Missouri, didn't prove to be as much of a battle as K-State won, 8-1. K-State also soundly defeated Arkansas-Little Rock, 7-2.

Bietau still sees room for improvement, though.

"We need to play more high-percentage tennis. I believe we are hitting the ball as well as anyone right now, but we need to hit the right shot at the right time," Bietau said.

Sports Briefly

Baseball opener postponed

The beginning of the 1989 Kansas State baseball season will again have to wait.

K-State had pushed back its scheduled Saturday doubleheader with Friends University to 1 p.m. today, but the weather once again was uncooperative. Coach Mike Clark said the Wildcats may play Friends later this week, but nothing definite has been set.

Waltrip triumphs at Daytona

DAYTONA BEACH, Fla. — Darrell Waltrip ended 16 years of frustration Sunday with a victory in the crash-filled $1.7 million Daytona 500, winning the biggest race of his life by taking perhaps the biggest chance of his career.

Waltrip, a three-time Winston Cup champion, who had never won the richest and most prestigious race on the NASCAR stock car circuit, took the lead four laps from the end and stayed on the track knowing he might not have enough gas to finish.

He averaged 148.466 mph in the race slowed by seven caution flags — most of them brought out by crashes — for 30 laps.

Royals go through workout

HAINES CITY, Fla. — Kansas City Royals' pitchers and catchers went through their third three-hour workout Sunday, although temperatures had dropped several degrees.

Temperatures were in the 80s for the Royals' first two practices but were in the 60s with a slight drizzle Sunday morning as the 29 players worked out.

Two Royals remain unsigned. They are starting third baseman Kevin Seitzer and rookie pitcher Rick Luecken, who has reported to camp. Seitzer and the remainder of the squad will not begin working out until Wednesday.

Tigers crush Nebraska

Hawks drop seventh straight

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Missouri sat down scoring leader Byron Irvin and his 20 points a game, so freshman Anthony Peeler started instead and scored 22.

Irvin sat on the bench for being late to practice as Peeler played 39 minutes and matched his career scoring high while leading the third-ranked Tigers past Nebraska 79-63 Sunday in a Big Eight game.

"Anthony Peeler is such a great player," said acting Missouri coach Rich Daly, after evening his record at 2-2 in place of Norm Stewart, who had cancer surgery last week.

"He'll come in and make some mistakes. But he's such a great athlete. He's got great foot movement, he's got great hands."

Irvin was held out of the Nebraska game for being 40 minutes late to practice Friday.

Peeler led Missouri to its 15th straight win at the Hearnes Center, 14 straight this year as the Tigers went to 22-5 overall and 8-2 in the Big Eight.

Nebraska shot just 26 percent in the first half and trailed at one point by 21-5.

Missouri center Gary Leonard led all scorers with 23 points, equaling his season high. Rich King had 22 and Beau Reid added 16 for Nebraska, 14-12 and 2-8.

OU 106, Colorado 88

Stacy King started slowly for Oklahoma in Boulder, but it didn't seem to matter against the outmanned Buffaloes.

"Oklahoma can explode on anybody," Colorado coach Tom Miller said. "Nobody can understand what it's like to stop Stacy King unless you play against him. He's so big and he has a great touch. In my book, they're the toughest team in the country."

King scored 23 of his 28 points in the second half as Oklahoma went to 23-3 and 9-1.

"We had some problems inside early on, then Stacy took over," Sooners coach Billy Tubbs said. "He got started late in the game. But he's been spotty in the first half lately."

Oklahoma took a 24-8 lead as Mookie Blaylock scored seven points in the early going.

Colorado, 7-16 and 2-8, got back within 10 with about eight minutes to play in the first half, but Oklahoma broke away again to a 37-21 lead.

Duke 102, Kansas 77

Duke's Danny Ferry had his jersey retired as his family looked on before the game, and then blistered struggling Kansas with 20 of his 26 points in the first half.

Kansas, burdened by injuries that have taxed an already short bench, lost for the seventh straight time as Coach Roy Williams made his first appearance at Duke since leaving the coaching staff of Dean Smith at North Carolina.

"It's not what I hoped the trip back to North Carolina would be," Williams said. "I want our players to remember this and to use it to get better. It has really been tough on them this year."

Duke, 19-4, took a 23-13 lead with 10 minutes to play in the first half, led 53-34 at the half and went up by as many as 27 in the second half.

Kansas fell to 16-10.

Iowa St. 90, OSU 81

Sam Mack scored a career-high 27 points and Mike Born had a career-high 26 for Iowa State, 13-9 and 4-6.

Mack set a school record with 15 free throws without a miss. Born tied a school record with five 3-point shots.

It all added up to victory in Ames over Oklahoma State, which hasn't figured yet how to win on the road.

Royce Jeffries scored 20 points and Richard Dumas added 17 for the Cowboys, 15-8 and 6-4.

Big Eight Roundup

Kansas slips by Lady Cats on shot in closing seconds

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

Lynn Page's short jumper with four seconds remaining Saturday night might have spoiled any hopes the Lady Cats had of getting an NCAA tournament at-large bid. Page's shot gave Kansas a 58-57 victory in Bramlage Coliseum and extended K-State's losing streak to four games.

The Lady Cats were sitting pretty good two weeks ago, riding a five-game winning streak and all alone in second place in the Big Eight Conference race, just two games behind league-leading Colorado.

Now, however, the Lady Cats dropped to 16-8 overall and 6-6 in the conference and may just need some sort of miracle to attract the tournament selection committee.

"My immediate thought just after the buzzer sounded was 'there goes any hopes of an at-large bid,'" Lady Cats coach Matilda Mossman said Saturday night. "You can't lose to an 11-12 team at home and expect to get in. It makes a big difference to the committee that sends out at-large bids."

Holding a 46-34 lead with 11:41 remaining, K-State looked to be on its way to a lop-sided victory, but the Lady Jayhawks had other ideas. Sparked by the play of freshman Geri Hart, KU went on a 14-4 spurt that was capped by a Hart three-pointer. Suddenly it was just a two-point K-State lead, 50-48, and the Lady Jayhawks were right back in it.

K-State put together a short 6-1 run and were back on top at the 2:37 mark, 56-49, but from there the Lady Cats would get only one more point. KU finished out the game with a 9-1 run capped by Page's jumper that put KU up 58-57. The Lady Cats needed a miracle with just threee seconds remaining.

K-State came out of the timeout and got the ball into the hands of Mary Jo Miller, but the miracle was not to be on this night, as Miller's desperation heave from just inside the timeline sailed wide left.

"I thought Geri Hart was definitely the key," Mossman said. "She came into the game and hadn't really shown she was that much of a scorer, and then she gets 19 points and leads her team."

"It just flowed for me tonight," Hart said. "I put the ball up a lot more than I usually do. Maybe it was because Shannon was out, but I really don't know."

With the win, KU evens its record out at 12-12 and moves to 4-8 in the conference.

'Her Alibi' bad alibi for movie

By Nancy B. Chartrand
Collegian Reviewer

Women of America rejoice — Paulina Porizkova cannot act.

It is a relief for mortal women to find out that the elite supermodel, whose face has graced the cover of every major fashion magazine in the past three years, is less than perfect in some aspect.

This lack of acting ability is apparent in the recent movie, "Her Alibi," which couples Porizkova with superhunk Tom Selleck.

Review

Since last year's Christmas box office smash, "Three Men and a Baby," moviegoers haven't seen much of Selleck. Unfortunately, it wasn't worth the wait.

Selleck plays Phillip Blackwood, a mystery novelist who is in a writer's slump. In an attempt to get a fresh plot for his debonair supersleuth, Peter Swift, he hangs out at the local courthouse with some of the regulars, who inform him of the newest cases.

It is in the courthouse where everything begins. Nina, played by Porizkova, is a Romanian defector who is brought in for questioning about a murder. Of course, Blackwood is instantly mesmerized by her beauty.

He quickly deicides that she is to be the subject of his latest novel and offers her an alibi, claimimg the two are having an affair and were together the night of the murder. He is convinced that a woman of such beauty could not possibly have committed murder.

In order to make the alibi stick, Nina moves into his house until the police have finished the investigation.

But strange things begin to happen. Blackwood suddenly starts having life-threatening accidents and soon he begins to wonder if perhaps she is a murderer and is trying to kill him.

Not bad so far — the plot is a little weak, but there are some funny accidents. The film also has some humorous narration by Selleck in the persona of Blackwood. From there it goes downhill.

Blackwood discovers all of his accidents were actually meant for Nina. Her family is a nationally known clown/trapeze family in Romania. Because it would be an embarrassment to the country, the Romanian government is trying to prevent them from defecting to the United States.

Not much of an exciting twist. A plot based on a trapeze and clown family was hard to swallow, but it does explain the scene where Nina evades Romanian henchmen by springing over a wall via a trampoline.

This movie obviously was a vehicle to display Porizkova's beauty. During the course of the movie the audience sees her in a towel, in a pool, in a rain shower, etc. The director seemed to be thinking, "Let's see how many ways we can show off Paulina's beauty."

Yes, Porizkova is beautiful, but she can't act. The difference between her and other actresses such as Kathleen Turner or Kelly McGillis is that they are beautiful, but also capable of portraying believable roles.

"Her Alibi" did an injustice to Selleck.

Five generations run shoe shop

By Linda Kleiner
Collegian Reporter

One of Aggieville's oldest businesses, Olson's Aggieville Shoe Service, is operated by the fourth and fifth generations of the Olson family.

Peter Olson started a shoemaker shop in downtown Manhattan in 1875, said Jeanne Mithen, librarian at the Riley County Historical Museum.

"My great-grandfather, Peter Olson, was a jack of all trades. He was a minister of the Lutheran Church in Manhattan, repaired shoes and worked with horses," said Edwin Olson Sr., fourth generation owner and operator.

Olson's Shoe Service started in Aggieville about 1913, Mithen said.

"The business was first located where Woody's Ladies Shop is today," Olson said. Then the business was moved to the building now occupied by Aggie Ski & Sport, before it was finally moved to its present location in March 1983, he said.

"My grandparents lived in the back of the store (at 1212 Moro St.), and where the shop sits now was my grandparents' garden," Olson said.

He said he can remember at age five going to the shop, sweeping the floor, emptying the trash and performing other jobs before running around Aggieville in the afternoons.

While in high school, Olson worked at Tommy Farrell's gas station, which was located where Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon is now, he said.

"In one day, another kid and I washed 20 cars for $1.25 each at the gas station," Olson said. "We didn't have the car wash places we have today.

"There was once a newspaper office, Tribune News, where The Loft is today. I delivered newspapers for them."

Olson remembers when horse-drawn milk wagons delivered milk door to door in Aggieville and when a person could ride a bus through Manhattan all day for a dime.

He said he hasn't seen much change in the two- to three-block area of Aggieville.

"It's the same old place, just new businesses," he said. "The biggest change was when traffic started traveling Bluemont Street more than Moro Street.

"At age 19, there was no way I was going to fix shoes for a living," Olson said.

But that changed when his father, Clyde Olson, passed away in 1964. The family asked him to operate the business.

Edwin Olson Jr., of the fifth generation to work in Olson's Aggieville Shoe Service, said he followed the family tradition of cleaning in the shop and doing different jobs at an early age.

"I was never forced to work in the shop; it was just something I wanted to do," Edwin said.

Like his father, Edwin has often thought of another form of livelihood but "will probably stay with the shop until I die," he said.

It's too early to tell, but Edwin's 15-month-old son, Dustin, could keep the family tradition going and be the sixth generation to run Olson's Aggieville Shoe Service.

the pilot can hear is wind passing over the wings, Guikema said.

"It was an incredibly eerie sound," he said.

The NASA 930's cabin is different than those in passenger jets. The walls, floor and ceiling are padded, and only a few seats — located towards the back of the cabin — are installed.

Spooner said the first flight was aborted before its scheduled completion time because a member of another crew didn't prepare for the plane's transition from the microgravity dive to the next climb. During the transition, the gravity increases to two times normal, which usually occurs within five to 10 seconds on NASA 930 flights.

A force of two times normal gravity makes a person's weight twice that of his or her normal weight. Spooner said the increased gravity had slammed the crew member against the cabin floor, breaking one of his ribs.

Spooner said he was pleased with the results of their initial experiments. The crew's efforts to qualify a blood analysis machine in flight, which will be used in additional microgravity experiments, occurred without a hitch, he said.

BioServe team members do not conduct experiments on personal projects during the NASA 930 flights, Spooner said.

"It has to be a team effort because we would be in trouble if, during a flight, one of us became incapacitated and no one else could do the individual's experiments."

Spooner and Guikema said society could reap benefits from biological research performed in microgravity conditions. To build a foundation for the advanced biological studies in microgravity, it is important to begin with basic biological experiments, they said.

The Life Sciences Steering Committee, headed by Terry Johnson, professor and director of the Division of Biology, has considered sending another BioServe team to Johnson Space Center.

The flight experiments would not occur before June, Spooner said.

"(The team) needs two or three months to prepare," he said. "We have to plan experiments, know what we're going to do, when we're going to do it, how we're going to do it, and then we'll have to go through crew training."

The crew training consists of practicing experiments so the maneuvers can be completed in less than 30 seconds, Spooner said.

Guikema said he expects BioServe Space Technologies to continue to develop, especially if long-term microgravity experimentation in a space station becomes possible.

"Unless we're going to be bound to this planet indefinitely, we need to learn how organisms behave in space," he said. "(Scientists haven't) been able to study an animal's entire reproductive cycle in space."

One of NASA's goals is to establish a "controlled ecologic life support system," which would involve plants as a means of supporting life during long periods in space, Spooner said. Developing a support system is a primary concern for the K-State researchers and for scientists across the nation.

dier to go take a hill, you don't have time to converse with him or her about why."

But there is another type of leadership that involves sitting down with people and reasoning with them.

In student government, Cuffy said, "you don't tell people to do anything.

"You try to get input from people," he said. "You try to make decision-making authority so it is handled at the lowest possible level."

Sometimes it is difficult to switch between the two styles of leadership. Cuffy said that is why it is important to have a good chief of staff.

Balancing time between academics and the job of student body president has been difficult for Cuffy.

"Being a student and being a representative of the student body is one of the biggest things I have had to deal with," he said. "I have academic goals. (I want to) achieve these academic goals and leave this university with the academic competence I feel I ought to have."

Cuffy said one side of him says he needs to be studious; the other side says he is representing the student body at K-State and should be meeting the students.

Attorney General outlines political career, routine

By Brian Hummell
Campus Editor

Serving his third term as the Attorney General of Kansas, Bob Stephan said he "feels fortunate to be attorney general again and happy with it."

Stephan spoke to the K-State chapter of the College Republicans Monday night.

"You'll find you can have a wonderful time in politics," he said. "Sometimes it's a little tough, sometimes you're going to cry, and sometimes you feel like a million bucks."

Stephan briefly outlined his political career and daily routine and the upcoming issues facing the Kansas Legislature.

"It's an active session, but I've never known one that wasn't," he said. "This one has been more busy early than in the past. ... There has been a lot of bloodletting early."

Stephan said reapportionment of the House would be the biggest issue the Legislature would tackle. Another issue he said would attract attention is a victim's rights bill.

Although he favors capital punishment, Stephan said that, after being rejected by the Senate, the issue should not be addressed for the remainder of the session.

"The death penalty should be over for this session," Stephan said. "There is no worthwhile purpose in dredging it up again."

His term expires in 1990 but he has "made no plans to run for re-election. I have no interest in running for any other office."

Stephan was considered a top candidate in the gubernatorial race in 1986 before dropping out of contention.

"It just wasn't in the cards," he said.

In October 1985 Stephan disclosed the terms of an out-of-court settlement of a 1982 sexual harrassment suit filed by Marcia Tomson-Stingley, a former file clerk. In November of last year, Stephan was ordered to pay Stingley $200,000 for breach of contract.

Stephan also speculated on the 1990 gubernatorial race, which may pit incumbent Gov. Mike Hayden against former two-term Gov. John Carlin.

"There is no question in my mind but that (Carlin) has an interest in running for governor," he said.

Books, materials shifted in Farrell due to overloading

By Chris Koger
Staff Writer

A room in Farrell Library has been overloaded since 1983, and now holds more than twice the weight for which it was designed when the building was built in 1927, said Larry Garvin, director of facilities planning.

Farrell 216, which contains a major part of the library's collection, was built to hold 60 pounds per square foot, Garvin said. The room is supporting about 124 pounds per square foot.

The excess weight isn't an immediate danger, but the library is "using prudent judgment," Garvin said.

"It has been this way for almost six years, and I would say it has been tested to show it can withstand more than the structural limits," he said.

Thirty full-time employees and 30 part-time student employees have been moved temporarily from Farrell 125, which is occupied by the cataloging and acquisitions departments. The office space is located directly beneath Farrell 216, and Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock said all but a few employees were relocated because of the excess weight above them.

Several employees will be allowed to remain in Farrell 125 because of a "safe zone" on the west end that isn't under Farrell 216, he said.

"Naturally, we don't want to injure anyone or function in an illegal manner, so we have already begun to reduce the weight in that room," Hobrock said.

The room shows no signs of sagging whatsoever, Garvin said.

"The weight hasn't affected it at all — it seems as if it can withstand anything short of an earthquake," he said.

Both Hobrock and Garvin said a crack has appeared in the floor of Farrell 216 and in the ceiling of Farrell 125, but added that there was no connection between the crack and the overloading.

"That (crack) has been there for over 30 years, and there is no evidence that it has widened any," Hobrock said.

Garvin said the crack was probably a result of the shrinking of the concrete soon after the building was constructed.

"It's common for concrete to crack like this, due to the thermal changes after it's poured," he said.

Hobrock said the library's stacks were remodeled and redistributed in 1983. According to a report conducted by the state division of architectural services in 1978, Farrell 216 could withstand up to 150 pounds per square foot.

"Naturally, we don't want to injure anyone or function in an illegal manner, so we have already begun to reduce the weight in that room."
— Brice Hobrock, Dean of Libraries

Farrell had been using the 1978 report as a guide on how much weight to put in the room, but several weeks ago Hobrock decided to check with facilities planning before adding more shelves.

Garvin said the original library blueprints stated that Farrell 216 and 315 were reading rooms designed to withstand 60 pounds per square foot.

He said he did not know how the state architects arrived at their figures, but plans to send the division of architectural services a copy of the recent K-State analysis and the 1978 letter from the architects.

"The architects might have had some information or knowledge about the structure we didn't have, but I have no idea how they established their findings," Garvin said.

Last week, Garvin and other facilities personnel calculated that the room was supporting more than twice the limit for which it was designed. Hobrock was notified of the problem Friday.

North's jury sworn in today

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A jury will be sworn in today in the trial of Oliver North, with the prosecution preparing a lineup of witnesses to testify he tried to cover up the Iran-Contra affair.

Lawyers for the fired presidential aide plan to rebut the prosecution's case by showing North had White House authorization for his activities. North, the key figure in the Iran-Contra affair, was indicted 11 months ago with former national security adviser John Poindexter and businessmen Richard Secord and Albert Hakim.

The latter three will be tried separately.

Two central charges against North, accusing him of conspiracy and theft in diverting Iranian arms sale profits to the Nicaraguan guerrillas, were thrown out last month on national security grounds.

The jury of nine women and three men was selected Feb. 9, but the trial was delayed when the Justice Department protested that North might divulge classified material in the courtroom. After receiving assurances from Independent Counsel Lawrence Walsh, the department on Wednesday dropped efforts to delay the trial.

The jurors have one thing in common: They had almost no exposure to North's nationally televised congressional testimony in 1987 in which he admitted, under limited immunity from prosecution, many details touching on the crimes with which he is charged.

The jurors include an electronics technician, a cashier and clerical worker who says "I don't like the news" and an unemployed former office manager who says she recalled that North was "selling something to Iran."

North, a decorated former Marine colonel, is accused of 12 criminal offenses.

Five include alleged lying to Congress in 1985 and 1986 by denying he was assisting the Contras. Four other counts allege that he lied to Congress and the attorney general and that he destroyed documents in November 1986.

North allegedly helped prepare false chronologies, saying no one in the U.S. government learned before January 1986 that Hawk missiles had been shipped to Iran in November 1985. He also is accused of lying to the attorney general and with falsifying documents showing his involvement with the Contras.

Witnesses against North include many of his former colleagues at the NSC as well as former military men who helped him keep the Contras supplied with weapons.

A key witness will be Robert McFarlane, the former presidential national security adviser who signed letters to Congress in 1985 denying the NSC's involvement in assisting the Contras. The government alleges that North prepared the letters.

McFarlane pleaded guilty to four misdemeanors and is cooperating with Walsh.

Former Attorney General Edwin Meese III is expected to testify about a weekend inquiry he conducted in 1986 that led to the discovery that proceeds from the Reagan administration's arms sales to Iran were diverted to the Contras. The government alleges North lied to Meese by saying that the NSC had no involvement in the diversion.

Charles Cooper, an assistant attorney general at the time of the Iran-Contra affair, also is likely to be asked about the Meese inquiry, which Cooper helped conduct. Cooper has said the Justice Department erred by not moving more quickly to protect documents shredded by North and his secretary, Fawn Hall.

Hall also will testify. She told Congress she altered, at North's request, documents indicating he assisted the Contras in 1984 and 1985, when U.S. military aid to the guerrillas was banned.

European governments protest Khomeini's order

By The Associated Press

European Common Market governments decided Monday to withdraw their top diplomats from Iran in protest of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's renewed order for Moslems to kill novelist Salman Rushdie. Britain went further by pulling out its entire embassy staff.

Foreign Secretary Sir Geoffrey Howe said the death threats against Rushdie and the publishers of "The Satanic Verses" for allegedly blaspheming Islam were "unwarranted interference" in Britain's internal affairs.

He left open the possibility of expelling Iran's lone diplomat in London, where Rushdie lives.

The 12 European Economic Community governments, in a sharp blow to Iran's hopes of improving relations with Western nations, decided to recall their diplomats for consulations and suspend high-level visits to and from Iran.

They said they also will restrict the movement of Iranian diplomats in their countries.

Howe told a news conference that the EEC foreign ministers, meeting in Brussels, had sent "a strong, concerted signal to the Iranian leadership that Khomeini's threats are an affront to international standards of behavior and will not be tolerated."

For Britain's part, he said, "it is no longer sensible to maintain a diplomatic presence in Tehran."

Iran's charge d'affaires in London, Mohammad Basti, will be summoned to hear "the reasons for this action along with the implications for Mr. Basti and his mission," Howe said.

Asked if that meant closing the Iranian Embassy, he replied: "I leave it for your own conclusions."

Rushdie, 41, apologized Saturday for any distress the publication of his book caused to Moslems, after Iranian President Ali Khamenei indicated that an apology could lead to a pardon.

On Sunday, however, Iran's official Islamic Republic News Agency quoted Khomeini as ruling out any reprieve for Rushdie and urging Moslems to "send him to hell" for his writings.

Neither Khomeini's statement nor IRNA referred to Khamenei's comments, reflecting a widening rift in the Iranian hierarchy over the Rushdie affair.

"There plainly is confusion amongst the Iran authorities," Howe said.

He added, however: "If the threat were turned into fact, that would call for an even more serious response, but I hope that it will not come to that."

Iran's deputy parliament speaker, Mehdi Karrubi, reaffirmed Khomeini's execution order Monday, IRNA reported.

Rushdie, an Indian-born Moslem, has been in hiding, reportedly under armed police guard, since Khomeini decreed Feb. 14 that he should be killed, and two Iranian religious leaders put a $5.2 million bounty on his head.

Moslems say "The Satanic Verses" portrays the prophet Mohammed's wives as prostitutes and suggests that he wrote, rather than Allah, the Koran, Islam's holy book.

The novel is banned in Pakistan, Bangladesh, Iran, India, Egypt and South Africa.

Firecracker chain sets record

KUALA LUMPUR, Malaysia — Festival organizers set off a 3½-mile chain of firecrackers worth $18,330 Monday and claimed it was a world record, the national Bernama news agency reported.

Spectators in Johore Baharu watched 3,338,777 firecrackers containing 1,468 pounds of gunpowder go up in smoke in the Firecracker Firing Festival, the news agency said from the region 180 miles south of Kuala Lumpur.

The festival was organized by the Tampoi branch of the Youth Movement of Malaysia to mark the 15th day of the Chinese lunar new year, Bernama said.

Jackson Tim, the movement's chairman, said the group will try to enter the feat in the Guinness Book of World Records.

Guinness lists the current world record at 2.47 miles, set in Macao on June 27, 1987, using 2,788,000 firecrackers and 1,323 pounds of gunpowder. The firing lasted 6 hours, 5 minutes.

At Monday's festival, the firecrackers were draped in an unbroken line around specially erected 10-foot high iron railings.

Hungarian police raid market

BUDAPEST, Hungary — Uniformed and plainclothes police raided a marketplace in western Hungary and made a baton charge against Polish tourists selling their goods unlawfully, a daily newspaper said Monday.

The trade union newspaper Nepszava said the regional police headquarters is investigating "this shocking action."

It said the police attacked Feb. 3 in Varpalota, a mining town 100 miles southwest of Budapest, where a group of Polish tourists was selling clothing, liquor and jewelry to locals for Hungarian currency.

The Polish sellers "broke out in lamentation and wailing" and Hungarian witnesses, "especially women, angry and some crying, threw strong words at the policemen," Nepszava said.

Such transactions are illegal in Soviet bloc countries and are considered black-marketeering. Police usually confiscate the goods and sometimes also fine those involved.

Appeals court stays execution

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. — A federal appeals court Monday blocked the execution of a man less than 24 hours before he was to die in the electric chair for murdering and raping a homemaker in 1983.

The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Atlanta granted an indefinite stay for a three-judge panel to hear Anthony Bertolotti's appeal.

It was the fifth stay granted in the case since Gov. Bob Martinez signed Bertolotti's death warrant Jan. 31.

Bertolotti, 36, had been scheduled to die Tuesday morning at Florida State Prison near Starke for the murder of Carol Ward, 46, in her home. He stole $31 and began stabbing Ward when she tried to persuade him to put down his weapon, according to testimony.

Rhodes scholars honored

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Warren Ault is the oldest living Rhodes scholar in the United States, but he still thinks of himself as a Kansas farm boy.

Ault, 102, was 20 years old when he graduated in 1907 from Baker University in Baldwin, Kan. He later earned degrees at Oxford University in England and Yale.

He and three other Rhodes scholars who attended Baker will be honored Thursday during the university's annual Founders' Day convocation.

"I can still remember finishing up my farm chores and racing across the campus to get to class on time," Ault said in a telephone interview with The Kansas City Star from his home in Concord, Mass.

Although he could not attend Founders' Day in person for medical reasons, a videotaped interview conducted last month with Jerry Weakley, director of alumni relations, will be shown during the ceremonies.

Dinner, concert conclude University's anniversary

By The Collegian Staff

A dinner and concert Monday in the Wareham Theater for alumni, friends and prospective students of K-State officially closed the University's 125th year.

A crowd of more than 200 attended the dinner and performance by the K-State Singers.

The 80 high school seniors who attended the dinner were entered in a drawing for four $100 scholarships.

Receiving scholarships were Tammy Trubey, Richard Stultz Jr., Jinny Dahl, Carla Van Nostram. Two alternates were chosen, said Becky Klingler, director of the KSU Alumni Association. Recipients must attend K-State in order to receive their scholarships.

The scholarships were created entirely from alumni contributions, said Joleen Hill, resident of Manhattan and K-State alumna.

"We, as K-State alumni, still care," Hill said. "We want them to come to our alma mater."

Guest speakers for the occasion included Athletic Director Steve Miller and Randolph Pohlman, dean of the College of Business Administration. Other guests included Provost James Coffman; Barbara Stowe, dean of the College of Human Ecology; Donald Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering and other faculty, administrators and alumni.

Pohlman said K-State is unique because of the quality of different curricula offered and the strides made by the departments to improve.

He cited the Department of Accounting as one of only 11 accredited accounting programs in the nation.

Miller stressed the important role a strong relationship between academics and athletics plays in making an athletic program successful.

Buildings and curricula are important, Hill said, but the most important aspect of a university is the quality of the faculty and staff who go with it.

"What it boils down to is that you have to like the people you are working with," she said.

Invitations to the dinner and concert were sent to any prospective college students from the Manhattan area who have shown an interest in K-State, either by coming to campus or by applying in writing, Hill said. Students from Manhattan, Riley, Westmoreland and other local communities attended.

K-State has more than 6,000 alumni living in Manhattan and surrounding communities, Hill said. Many of the best students in the state have been overlooked because they live in or near Manhattan.

Red Cross in Union

Helpful hints given to blood donors

By Dave Young
Collegian Reporter

The Wichita regional Red Cross will be taking blood donations as part of its Bloodmobile program from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. today through Friday in Union K, S and U ballrooms.

Although appointments are not required, they will reduce the waiting time for donors, said Cindy Burke, staff assistant at Lafene Student Health Center. Donors can schedule appointments at the bloodmobile appointment table on the Union Concourse through Friday.

"We need all the help we can get," Burke said. "We usually rely on retired individuals to donate their time, but we're concerned that with many being ill, (and) with the bad weather, they won't be able to make it."

While everyone is encouraged to give blood, there are some requirements, she said.

"You must be (at least) 17 years old and weigh 110 pounds," Burke said.

"People should eat a good breakfast or lunch prior to donating their blood," she said.

Last semester's bloodmobile brought in 1,306 pints of blood, and bloodmobile coordinators hope they can reach their goal of 1,400 pints, she said.

"Only 2 percent of the blood is used whole," she said. "The other 98 percent is broken down into parts, like white blood cells and plasma."

Campus sponsors for the bloodmobile are Circle K service organization, Delta Tau Delta fraternity and Arnold Air Society.

"Twenty-seven cadets will be involved with the bloodmobile," said Capt. John Taglieri, adviser to the Arnold Air Society.

Burke said: "The K-State bloodmobile is the largest in Kansas. Most of the bloodmobiles in Kansas only receive one of the three teams available, but the K-State drive requires all three teams.

"The Wichita region of the Red Cross relies heavily on K-State for this reason."

Burke said she hopes people will not be scared of donating because of any fears or misconceptions.

The Wichita region provides blood for 114 hospitals in Kansas and Nebraska, she said.

Awards will be given to living groups with the highest percentage of member participation.

Tass reports statistics for Armenian earthquake

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — The Dec. 7 earthquake that struck Armenia caused $16.2 billion in damage and destroyed 58 villages and towns, the Tass news agency said Monday.

The earthquake killed 25,000 people and injured 19,000, according to the Armenian Committee on Statistics in a report carried by the official news agency.

"More than 20 towns and 342 villages were affected and 58 of them were completely destroyed," Tass said. "Twenty-five thousand bodies and 15,000 survivors were pulled from under the rubble. A total of 19,000 people were injured," it said.

The report said 11 percent of Armenia's housing was lost, 130 factories had to stop work and 299 government-owned and cooperative farms were damaged.

Armenia was unable to meet key social and economic targets for 1988 because of the earthquake, mistakes in economic management and widespread absenteeism during strikes — an apparent reference to work stoppages.

Enrollment cap hurts architecture students

After accepting 600 incoming freshmen and transfer students, the College of Architecture has placed a cap of 225 students on studio spots.

Burdened with the second worst student-teacher ratio among accredited architecture schools and a lean budget, the school had no choice but to limit its students.

For those students who don't get studio spots but were allowed to enroll in the architecture program — tough luck. After taking a year of history and theory classes, students who didn't get a studio spot will be able to reapply, even though they would still be a year behind in the five-year program.

But don't start dusting off that drafting table just yet. As with most things in life, there is no guarantee that even after the first year in the program, students will get a studio spot.

To maintain a quality and competitive architecture program, the enrollment cap is necessary. At the same time, the new policy seems to be in the opposite corner of K-State's most appealing selling point — "we have room and hospitality for everyone." It looks as if the days of being a state school that welcomes all Kansas students are over.

The job of architecture students — enduring all-night studios, tremendous amounts of stress and spending hundreds of dollars in supplies — has just gotten harder. Once again, a dismal budget combined with an increase in enrollment is taking its toll on students and faculty.

In the past few years, K-State's administration has made a concentrated effort to increase enrollment and receive greater recognition. However, when the University is tugged by higher enrollment figures, it must resort to cutthroat, elitist tactics to maintain its quality programs.

Needless to say, many architecture hopefuls will be disappointed. The bottom line comes down to raw common sense — the University shouldn't make promises if it's not prepared to keep them.

Mark Schmeller
Collegian Columnist

Yesterday, upon hearing that David Duke, head of the National Association for the Advancement of White People and former Grand Wizard of the Ku Klux Klan, had been elected to a seat in the Louisiana House of Representatives, I was overcome with a strange, hard-to-define feeling.

I wasn't really outraged or suprised. I mean, heck, this is a democracy here. If a bunch of rubes from lily-white (21,000 white voters, 46 black) Old Metairie, Louisiana, want to put a fascist in the statehouse, far be it for me to stop them. After all, this is the town where, just two years ago, the sheriff told his deputies to arrest any blacks walking on the streets at night.

My feelings were more along the lines of a sort of perverse pleasure. There isn't really a word in the English language for it. Fortunately, the Germans have one — Schadenfreude. It means "joy derived from the sufferings of others." In this case, it's the sufferings of the Republican Party.

You see, David Duke claims to be a member of the Grand Old Party. GOP leaders, like newly elected national chairman Lee Atwater, swear they are offended by Duke's overt racism and they promise to "excommunicate" him from the party.

Oh, come off it Republicans! What is really shocking about the whole Davey Duke doo-doo is the hypocrisy of the Republican Party.

For some 20 years, Republicans have employed subtle messages of racism to win over the bubba vote and build a strong political base in the South. Perhaps this was not an intentional appeal to racist ideologies. But, when Nixon, Reagan and Bush focused their campaign rhetoric on such racially galvanizing issues as crime, the death penalty and welfare, they surely must have recognized the appeal their positions on such issues held for bigots.

When Reagan told a 1984 campaign rally that "the South will rise again," he must have had some inkling of the meanings that phrase held for many of the white-sheeted ones. And when George Bush made the black, menacing face of Willie Horton a centerpiece of his campaign, didn't he understand that the image of a black raping a white woman would stir up the sort of racist fears that send Caucasians scurrying to the polls?

It is cheap hypocrisy for Atwater, the creator of the Willie Horton get-the-bubba-vote-out strategy, to now feign disgust at Duke's election. It's as if Atwater, after sweeping the South, suddenly discovered there is such a thing as racism in the South and the Republican Party. Just who did he think was casting Republican votes down there anyway? Elvis?

Of course, the Republican Party would like to think that Duke was elected because the good white folk of Old Metairie had been duped into thinking that Duke wasn't a racist. Dream on.

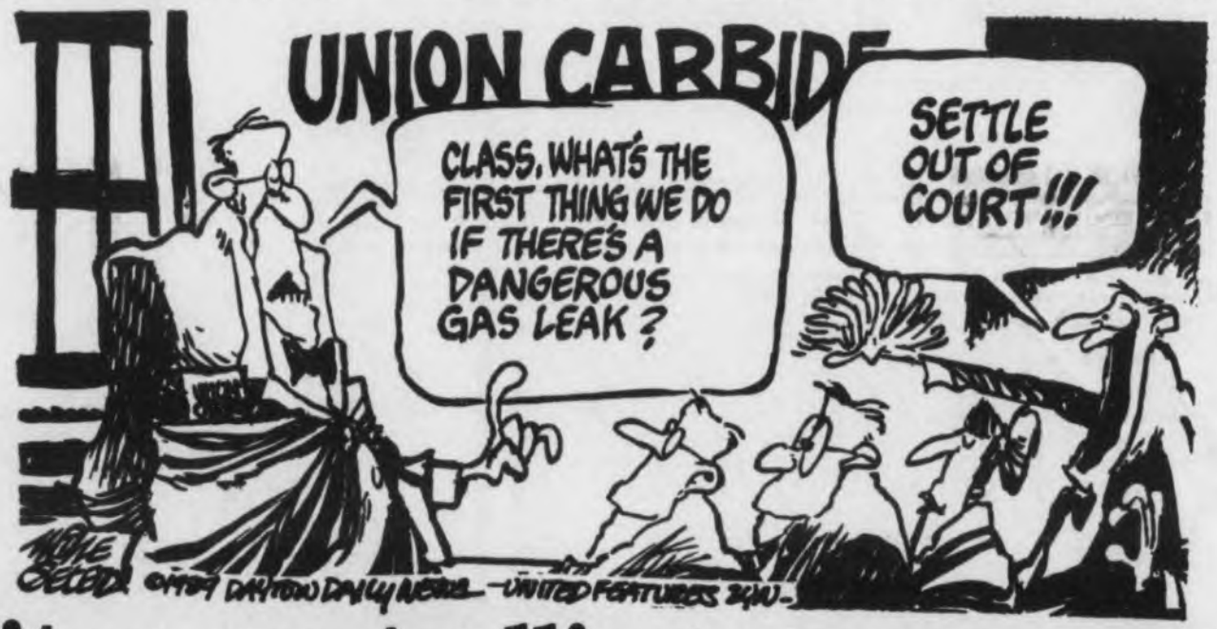
Duke openly admits he left the Klan because it had a "negative image" (imagine that!), not because his ideology had changed. His new organization, the NAAWP, advocates a racial resettlement plan which, among other things, would confine all Jews to Manhattan and Long Island, which will be renamed "West Israel."

Duke said Old Metairie is "a microcosm of white America." God forbid. One local, Earlie Pickett, told a Washington Post reporter she dislikes the local Catholic bishop because "He likes colored people. He says we should love colored people. But they've been different from the beginning, and God must have had a reason for making them that way."

Another reporter overheard one country club member telling another that Duke's election "would send a message to blacks" — you know, like burning lawn decorations.

Perhaps the most pleasing thing about the whole Duke mess is that the same party that has spent the last 20 years appealing to the lowest elements in America now has to be seen in public with them. In other words, the kooks have come home to roost.

The Democratic Party has been hampered with this problem for years. The Democrats have carried the white vote only once since 1950. Such a fact is truly revealing; it demonstrates the extent to which this country is still divided along racial lines. It is a division that Republicans have exploited skillfully and remorselessly.



And while the Republicans have managed to create the impression of a unified and pure party of upright folk, they have exploited the diversity and internal strife of the Democrats to their benefit.

Every time the Democrats try to conduct a convention, every whacked-out radical, dope-smokin' fiend, brat-pack movie star, sex-starved sodomite and tie-dyed '60s washout comes out of the woodwork to offend decent, mainstream American folk.

And who could forget that jail-bound, credit card swindler and homophobe Lyndon LaRouche, who called himself a Democrat and even got some of his cronies elected under that assumed name?

Now the Republican Party is facing the same problem. No longer will Tom Selleck, Lee Greenwood and a watered-down Pat Robertson dominate the convention. Bring out all those nuts who we know have been voting Republican for the past 20 years!

The white supremacists, the skinheads and the rednecks have earned their place. Republican rhetoric, suffused with subtle racist innuendo, has invited them. It's time they took their rightful, visible place.

Elites controlling government

"Let me tell you about the Soviet Union," says former President Ronald Reagan in a cartoon.

"They've got a history of doddering old figureheads for leaders, military build up at the expense of their economy ..."

The great communicator pauses to think, then concludes, "We've learned a lot from the Soviet Union."

There is more to the comparison than might strike you at first.

Beginning with the founding fathers, this country has been ruled by an elite segment of the population that has built political influence from the base of its economic power.

Of the wealthy junta of landowners who framed our Constitution, Benjamin Rush often referred to the common people as "scum," and Alexander Hamilton called the people "a great beast."

More recently, Reagan presided over the biggest peacetime military buildup in history, while slashing social programs to tatters. We of weaker minds would dare to speculate that this practice in austerity had something to do with what we thought to be the disappearance of low-cost housing for the poor and the availability of food stamps.

But Reagan's wisdom set us at ease when during the 1988 election campaign he said, "If I were to listen to Michael Dukakis long enough, I'd think that people were starving and that there was homelessness."

Such is the pattern of thinking among many of America's political and economic elite. Not only do they refuse to consider they may be in part responsible for some of our social ills, they simply deny any problems exist.

The same goes for their thinking on foreign policy, as the Iran-Contra scandal shows. What is worse here, though, is that the members involved know for a fact what they did, but still pretend nothing happened. In short, they lie.

Their reasons for doing so harken back to the idea of "doddering old figureheads for leaders," in the Reagan cartoon. Our leaders may not all be ancient and decrepit, but they are to a degree entrenched, bureaucratic figureheads who want to sustain their images and their power.

This is why we're hearing all the gobbledygook about not releasing the government documents Oliver North has requested for aid in his defense on the grounds of protecting "U.S. national security interests."

The common reaction of most American citizens is to think that it is impossible to tell what this term means due to the fact that the government is keeping the information it refers to secret. But it's not. All we have to do is consider how government officials have used such terms in the past.

When asked whether the United States was bombing the neutral country of Cambodia during the Vietnam War, President Nixon responded, "I don't think such knowledge would serve the interests of the American public at this time."

Was it not in our interests to know that our Air Force was conducting genocide from the air on Cambodian peasants, eventually killing as many as half a million of them? Obviously, the only interests served by Nixon's gibberish were his own.

And what are we to think about the time during the Iran-Contra hearings when Rep. Jack Brooks started to question Oliver North about the plan he had drawn up to suspend the Constitution and institute martial law in the event of widespread public opposition to a U.S. military invasion abroad?

Committee Chairman Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, interrupted him immediately and told him to withdraw the question, citing reasons of "vital interest to the security of the United States government."

Under North's plan, control of the United States was to be turned over to the crisis-management agency, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, directed by Louis Guiffrida, a close associate of Reagan and former Attorney General Edwin Meese III.

While at the Army War College in 1970, Guiffrida wrote a memorandum calling for the rounding up and confinement of all "American negroes" in "assemble-centers or relocation camps" in the event of civil disorder.

What about drug running by the Contras? Sen. John Kerry's committee has uncovered ample evidence of it, but so far it has not surfaced as a main issue of the scandal.

And what about drug running by the secret team of shadowy figures in governmental operations like retired Gen. Richard Secord, retired Gen. John Singlaub, Thomas Clines, Theodore Shackley, and others? The Christic Institute, a law firm devoted to public concerns, as well as a number of individuals, has turned up evidence that the secret team began running opium out of Thailand and Laos when it carried out covert operations there under the auspices of the CIA in the 1960s.

Clearly, our government officials do not want these kinds of things to come to light. They would besmirch not only the romantic image of our moral, honorable, just nation under God, but would also tarnish the same types of images many of us hold of our supposedly great leaders.

Then a "crisis of democracy" might break out. That is, the people might get the idea that they'd been getting the shaft and decide to do something about it.

All sorts of crazy things might transpire! There might be demands from the public that their leaders act responsibly according to their wishes and report honestly to them. The public might decide to start choosing their leaders intelligently, based on issues rather than rhetoric and image. The whole situation might culminate with a massive, sustained chorus of, "We're mad as hell, and we're not gonna take it anymore!"

Donating an hour aids self, community

Commentary

Editor's note: Amy Laughlin is a junior in business administration and secretary of the Manhattan chapter of Circle K.

One hour is a unit of time most of us take for granted because of our various responsibilities and obligations.

What if you could give an hour of your time to save another person's life? Or to possibly save your own?

What if that hour of time could be used to save a victim of an automobile crash, a fall or complications from childbirth? Would you be willing to make this trade-off?

Would you be willing to trade an hour of your time to help find the cure for cancer, herpes, acquired immune deficiency syndrome, and other diseases?

This sounds like a reasonable trade; one hour of your precious time to help others and possibly yourself. Most of us would probably be willing to make such a trade.

What if I told you the hour I want you to trade will be spent in getting a partial checkup for free? You will have your temperature and blood pressure checked for free. You will have a partial review of your medical history with a nurse, and you will even find out if you have enough iron in your body. All this, free of charge.

Is this sounding more reasonable? Let's add the benefits of spending most of an hour on your back, reclining in a large, webbed chair. You can also converse with others. Who knows, you might even see some of your friends at this social health gathering.

Let's add one more benefit — free food!

How about orange juice as a start, and, during the last 15 minutes, you will get a doughnut and a cup of tea, coffee or orange juice.

As a final free bonus, you will receive a donor card which will list your name, address, identification number, sex, birthdate and blood type.

Are you ready to donate? Great! Go to the Union today and give blood at the K-State Bloodmobile, which will be on campus through Friday.

All of the above are included when you give blood. It's a safe, relatively painless procedure which takes about an hour of your time.

K-State is the largest donation site in the Wichita regional Red Cross area. Each visit we set a goal of 1,400 units of blood, or 350 units per day. In order to reach that goal, we need everyone's help, not only as donors, but also as volunteer helpers.

Volunteers are needed to fill several different positions at the bloodmobile site. We need workers for the scheduling and registration tables, people to assist with the hematron and vitals check machines, and volunteers to serve as donor escorts and canteen donor attendants.

With so many positions to fill each day, we need all the help we can get.

Blood is necessary for research and emergency medical use. Hospitals always need to have a ready supply of blood. The Red Cross supplies this blood, but it requires donations to maintain its inventory.

If you are in good health and are able to donate blood, please do so.

If you aren't able, or aren't comfortable with donating blood, then donate an hour as a volunteer. It's an easy way to help someone you don't know, or maybe someone you do.

One hour of your life can make a difference.

Sunset Zoo lecture series features various speakers

By Laurie Cox
Collegian Reporter

For the third year in a row, the Sunset Zoo is offering its Winter Education Program Series to members of Friends of the Zoo and to the public.

The program consists of three to four lectures ranging on various topics each year. Topics have included zoos of Europe, the Amazon, and Master Planning Zoos. Speakers from all over the world have given lectures in the past.

"The 1989 Winter Education Program Series is a membership benefit. Members are admitted free of charge with their membership cards," said Don Wixom, curator of education for the Sunset Zoo. "The public is invited and encouraged to attend. Admission is $2.00 per person."

The zoo has already had two of the four lectures scheduled for this season. Still to speak are Richard Block, director of public programs for the World Wildlife Fund and the Conservation Foundation, and Ruth Morris Keesling, president of the Digit Fund of Englewood, Colorado.

Block will deliver the third program at 7:30 p.m. today at the Manhattan Holiday Inn and Holidome. He will present a slide show and lecture entitled "Our Endangered World."

Keesling will deliver the final presentation of the series on "Saving the Mountain Gorilla" at 7:30 p.m. April 3 at the Holidome.

In addition to the Winter Education Program Series, the zoo also offers live animal demonstrations and tours of the zoo throughout the year.

"People just need to call and book a time to visit," Wixom said. "We work with many different schools and service clubs. Currently we have about 6,000 people scheduled for lectures and tours and an average total for us in a year is serving about 13,000 to 14,000 people at the zoo."

Many K-State students are enrolled in programs sponsored by the zoo.

"Most attend volunteer classes but some enroll in our Zoo Management Intern Program," said Wixom. "This program prepares people for jobs in a zoo. They take lecture classes in management and experience actual tasks through hands-on efforts.

"Close to 90 percent of people who leave the program find a zoo to work at," he said. "The students are not graded but when the coordinator feels the student has learned it all, they are allowed to give tours and do other service jobs at the zoo."

BSU receives regional award

By Angie Smith
Collegian Reporter

K-State's Black Student Union received an award for the "Most Outstanding Black Student Union" at the 12th Annual Big Eight Conference of Black Student Unions, said Reginland McGowan, director of Upward Bound and BSU adviser.

The conference was at the University of Colorado in Boulder from Thursday to Sunday.

"It was crystal clear that students from K-State came to Colorado with a clear purpose and served as role models for other students," McGowan said.

Crescentia Brown, president of K-State's BSU, was awarded for being one of the top three BSU leaders, he said.

K-State has made a special effort to provide counseling in problem solving, communication skills and effective leadership, McGowan said.

"As a result of that training, we have seen our kids involved in leadership roles and participating in the actual decision-making of problems which directly involve (the minority).

"Our kids played a valuable role in the conference."
—Diana Caldwell student coordinator

"K-State winning Most Outstanding BSU Award was based on this participation and on hosting a successful Big Eight Conference last year," McGowan said.

BSU is comprised of black, international and other students interested in serving as advocates of the union, he said. The group has about 50 active members.

Diana Caldwell, minority student coordinator, said the Big Eight Conference of Black Student Unions provides a forum for minority students and decreases the feeling of isolation sometimes experienced by members of a minority.

The conference lasts for three days and includes workshops on overcoming racism and strategies of becoming effective leaders, Caldwell said.

"Our kids played a valuable role in the conference," she said.

K-State participated in every workshop and banquet with pride and enthusiasm, which led other participants at the conference to show support for their peers, Caldwell said.

Gubicza to start opener

By The Associated Press

HAINES CITY, Fla. — Mark Gubicza, who won 20 games for the Kansas City Royals last season, was named the opening day starting pitcher by the Royals Monday.

Gubicza, 20-8, was scheduled to open April 3 against the Toronto Blue Jays in Kansas City. The Royals said Gubicza will also start the March 3 spring opener against the Los Angeles Dodgers.

"It's definitely a great honor," said Gubicza, who got his first opening day assignment after five seasons with the Royals. "It's a reflection of what I did last year. It's a great challenge because now I'll be pitching against the best pitcher from each team."

First baseman George Brett, who hit .306 last year, and five other position players reported to the Royals' spring camp Monday and went through informal workouts.

Other position players who showed up early were second baseman Frank White, shortstop Kurt Stillwell, utility player Bill Pecota, reserve infielder Buddy Biancalana and outfielder Gary Thurman.

While 29 Royals' pitchers and catchers have been working out since Friday, the first full-squad practice will be Wednesday. Position players who checked in early had unsupervised workouts.

With Brett, White and Stillwell in camp, only starting third baseman Kevin Seitzer has not reported among the Royals infield starters from a year ago.

Biancalana is back with Kansas City following stints with the Houston Astros and Atlanta Braves. The utility infielder was a key contributor to the Royals' 1985 World Championship team.

More allegations surface at MU

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Missouri assistant coach Rich Daly has close ties to a Detroit man whose efforts to steer area players to Missouri may have violated NCAA rules, according to published reports.

Daly told the St. Louis Post-Dispatch that Vic Adams was a good friend.

"Another coach from a Big Eight school introduced me to him," the Post-Dispatch quoted Daly as saying in a three-part series the newspaper published in December.

"There are five or six guys just like Vic who are good friends of mine. Vic goes to all the games," Daly said. "If you call him up and ask what is Northwestern High's starting lineup, he'll tell you. You ask him Cass Tech's starting lineup, he tells you. There are probably 30 more guys who go to all the games."

The Kansas City Star reported Sunday that 23 people in Detroit identified Adams as a representative of Missouri.

Daly has signed seven key players from Detroit during his six years at Missouri, including former guard Lynn Hardy, current starting guard Lee Coward and recruit Daniel Lyton.

Eight people told the Star that Greg Pickett, a junior varsity coach, guided Doug Smith to Missouri and had a role in the signing of Lyton.

NCAA rules since 1983 have banned anyone other than a head coach and two full-time assistants from recruiting. Boosters and other school representatives have been prohibited from contacting recruits by telephone or mail since 1987.

Missouri athletic director Dick Tamburo told the Post-Dispatch Sunday that a Chicago law firm hired last week to investigate allegations of rules violations in the recruiting of P.J. Mays of Cincinnati will also look into allegations of improper recruiting in Detroit.

"I want them to look at the whole thing," Tamburo said. "I think it's important for the university that we have outside, independent people who know what the business is about, handle the investigation — or review, however you want to put it."

Detroit-area high school players told the Star that Adams took them to Detroit Pistons games or out to dinner at his expense and entertained prospects in his apartment while encouraging them to attend Missouri.

Adams showed a Missouri highlight film and often wore clothing with the Missouri logo, players said.

"I'm tired of all these sick rumors," Adams told the Star. "I'm not helping anybody, OK. I know a lot of coaches, OK. But I'm not helping anybody out. I see the assistant coaches from Iowa, Missouri, Iowa State. All of them are here all the time. That's why, I guess, the kids are going there."

OU remains atop college hoop poll

By The Associated Press

Oklahoma on Monday became the first No. 1 team in five weeks to hold the top spot in The Associated Press college basketball poll.

The Sooners did need some extra time, however, as they were taken to overtime before beating Kansas 94-89 last week. That and a victory over Colorado, also on the road, improved the Sooners to 23-3 and earned them 61 of the 65 first-place votes from the nationwide panel of sportswriters and broadcasters and 1,296 points.

Meanwhile, two schools made their first-ever appearances in the poll.

St. Mary's, Calif., 22-3, joined the Top Twenty at No. 19, while Ball State, 21-2, took the final spot in the rankings.

Arizona, 20-3, held second, receiving two first-place votes and 1,224 points.

Georgetown, 20-3, improved one place from last week with 1,146 points. Indiana, which beat Michigan at the buzzer in its only game last week, jumped from ninth to fourth.

The Hoosiers, 21-5, received one first-place vote and 976 points, four more than North Carolina, 22-5.

The Tar Heels, who jumped three places with two victories last week, were followed by Syracuse, which held the No. 6 spot, and Missouri, which dropped from third after losing at Iowa State last week.

Syracuse, 22-5, split two games last week, losing to Georgetown and beating Providence. The Orangemen had 934 points, four more than Missouri, 22-5.

Louisville, 18-5, and Duke, 19-4, each jumped two places from last week. The Cardinals moved to eighth with 852 points, while Duke had 810.

Illinois, fifth last week, rounded out the Top Ten after losing 72-52 at Wisconsin.

NCAA: rules violators have declined recently

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The executive director of the NCAA said Monday that rules violators will never be totally eliminated but serious violations are down substantially "and they've been going down at a steady rate in the last 2-3 years."

Dick Schultz told the NCAA's annual College Football Preview that major violations have been decreasing despite recent probations to the football programs at Houston, Oklahoma, Oklahoma State and Texas A&M.

"I know there are a lot of people who are very cynical because things keep cropping up, and they say, 'Well, how can you say this?'" Schultz said. "But I'll specifically say that what you see, and what you saw happen and the penalties that were there really don't describe what's going on in intercollegiate athletics today.

"Whether you want to believe it or not, the number of violations is down substantially."

He said the recent probations were penalties for violations that occurred as long as four years ago.

Schultz categorized the major challenges facing intercollegiate athletics and the NCAA as "external challenges and internal challenges.

"The external challenges are not simple, but they're simply stated — it's the perceptions that we find in intercollegiate athletics today and the perceptions following the NCAA as an organization that have to be dealt with — the integrity issues in intercollegiate athletics and how people view them.

"We're never going to legislate integrity. We've tried that for years and we've ended up with a very complicated set of rules.

"We've simplified those with the new (NCAA) manual, but there are still a lot of rules there. Every one of them is there because of what some individual or some school or some group did."

Instead of more rules and a larger enforcement staff, the schools and their athletic personnel hold the solution, he said.

"We're not going to achieve integrity in intercollegiate athletics by doubling or tripling the size of our enforcement staff.

"We're caught up now. The last rash that you saw in December and right around bowl time really represented cases that have been in the works for the last two to three years, some even four years.

"The conventions in '84 and '85 that zeroed in on the integrity issues and separated major and secondary infractions and established stiffer penalties got everybody's attention.

"The fact that the infractions commitee has been very tough and hardnosed in its approach to major violators, I think the message is out there that there aren't any sacred cows, that if you do willfully violate the rules, eventually you're going to get caught."

Road wins in Big 8 rare

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — If basketball history is any gauge, Kansas, Missouri, K-State and Colorado may be in trouble Wednesday night.

They're all on the road. And the road is unkind to basketball teams of any stripe — high school, college or pro.

But the road has been especially hostile this year to most Big Eight teams, who are a collective 14-26 away from home in conference games.

"I'm not sure why it is," Coach Danny Nee of Nebraska said Monday during the weekly Big Eight coaches' briefing. "We've tried going the day of the game. We've gone in the night before. We've done all kinds of different things. But in all college basketball and in the NBA, the home court advantage has been very significant. I don't know the reason why, but it's a fact."

Oklahoma State has been almost a split personality, depending on where the Cowboys play. Their only road victory in five tries was at Kansas during the Jayhawks' current seven-game losing skid.

"At first, I didn't think it was psychological, but I guess that's the way you have to look at it," Oklahoma State coach Leonard Hamilton said. "It seems to affect everybody in the league."

Hamilton has tried to analyze the home-and-away syndrome.

"We're going to try to get ourselves in the proper frame of mind to play people on the road in the Big Eight," he said. "I think you have a lot of great home crowds that seem to cause the home team to play with inspired enthusiasm. I'm not so sure it has a negative affect on the visiting tream as much as it has a positive effect on the home team."

A common complaint throughout basketball history has been that officials are intimidated by the home crowd.

Hey Schembechler, wake up, you don't have it so bad

It's Just Madness

CHRIS HAYS
Sports Editor

I guess Michigan football coach Bo Schembechler didn't have anything else to gripe about at the NCAA's annual College Football Preview conference in Kansas City, so he had to start picking on television.

Schembechler said that college football needs "somebody with enough guts" to stand up and stop television from dictating starting times.

What the heck is he so worried about? The Wolverines led the nation in attendance for the 15th straight time last year, averaging 104,801 per game. So television isn't exactly making the fans stay home, and they also don't seem to be too worried about whether the game starts at 1 p.m. or 7 p.m. (Of course, they may complain should start times get up around 8 p.m., because that would be cutting into the students' precious drinking time.)

How does Schembechler think he was able to land some of the nation's top football talent over the years? Sure, he's a respected coach, but I'm sure it wasn't just his personality that got the attention of those young, easily-influenced high school prospects.

They want to play football on television, and with Michigan fielding one of the nation's top teams year after year, they figure there's a good chance at getting a little recognition.

Schembechler said that college football games were meant to be played at 1 p.m., and I'm sure that many of the die-hard fans from the days of the let's-run-it-up-the-middle-every-time era would agree.

But who really cares what time the game starts? The fact that a team is playing on television is the best recruiting tool any school could ask for, and I don't think there are too many high school prospects out there who will refuse to sign with a school unless they are assured they will not have to play a night game.

Wednesday, Lon Kruger's men's basketball team will play its fourth game of the season that has had its start time affected by television. Because ESPN is airing K-State's game with Oklahoma in Norman, the contest will not tip off until 9:10 p.m., but you don't hear Coach Kruger whining.

"I don't think that the time the game is played really has any effect on the outcome," Kruger said.

Of course, Michigan isn't affected nearly as much as K-State when it comes to tallying up TV revenues. The Wolverines make more money on gate receipts than they do from TV, but they also average 83,493 more fans per game. K-State's fair-weather "faithful" only managed to fill half of KSU Stadium last year, with an average of 21,308. After that kind of figure, I think we know who should be doing the whining — certainly not Schembechler.

Schembechler also said, "If our attendance dropped by 10,000 a game, we'd still have over 90,000, but we're hurting. We could not afford to lose fan support like that."

Waa! Waa! I hope everyone is playing their violins for poor Bo and his "hurting" Wolverines. If he wants to see hurting, he ought to come down to Manhattan some fall Saturday and try to get a seat in half-empty KSU Stadium. At least he would be happy — most of K-State's games kick off about 1 p.m.

And I bet Schembechler and the rest of Michigan's VIPs haven't been worried about trying to get an athletic fee passed. Give us a break Bo!

Leaking crude oil tank causes evacuation of 7,000 people

By The Associated Press

PORT ARTHUR, Texas — As many as 7,000 people were evacuated from their homes Monday after a leaking crude oil tank at a Chevron plant created a noxious cloud of gas with traces of hydrogen sulfide, officials said.

More than 20 people were treated and released at hospitals for minor reactions to the fumes, most for fume inhalation, officials said.

Chevron officials said they were monitoring air quality in the area of the leak since it was discovered in the early afternoon, and described the gaseous release as a miminum health hazard that created a terrible odor.

"Most crude oils in Texas have sulphur in them, and that means their gas contains hydrogen sulfide, which is listed as one of the hazardous chemicals," said Chevron spokesman Art Spencer.

Hydrogen sulfide is a flammable, poisonous gas with a characteristic odor of rotten eggs.

"We're doing continuous monitoring and we're finding that there's nothing there that is hazardous to health and we're also finding that the hydrocarbon smell in the air is lessening," Spencer said.

"But the odor got so strong that the city emergency response unit decided to go ahead and evacuate people downwind of it," he said.

Authorities described the evacuation as the largest in recent years in this coastal city, a heavily industrial area near the Louisiana border.

"We've had some really bad fires at these plants where people were injured and killed, but even then we never had an evacuation of this magnitude, and I've been here 28 years," said Port Arthur police Sgt. Cedric Clayton.

He estimated that 5,000 to 7,000 people were evacuated from a densely populated area on Port Arthur's west side. Three schools were opened as emergency shelters, Clayton said.

"We decided to evacuate the entire area simply as a safety precaution," he said.

Library

"I was planning to put five more shelves in the room, and took the precaution of having University facilities look at it," Hobrock said. "Of course I can't put them in there now. We'll have to take at least half of the shelves out now."

Workers have already begun constructing shelves on the fifth floor, which will hold music and art books that are being stored on the fourth floor. Books from Farrell 216 will be moved to the fourth floor.

Hobrock said although there will be the same amount of space in use at the library, students will be inconvenienced. In order to help move the books and shelves, the students working in the cataloging and acquisitions departments will lose about two weeks of productive time.

"These next two weeks are going to be chaotic, with the moving around," Hobrock said. "Eventually, books that were in one area will be spread out. Also, study space on the fourth and fifth floors will be moved to Room 216, which has no air conditioning."

Long-term effects will be more evident, he said.

"We've been looking at the whole space situation at the library, and it's quite clear we're running out of space," Hobrock said. "At the current rate, the shelves will be full by 1993, and although the recent discovery doesn't drastically change plans, we can't use all of the space in Room 216 as we had planned."

Library officials had planned to move an art and periodicals collection from the fourth floor to Farrell 315 in April, but only half of the collection can be moved now, Hobrock said.

"We have to be careful about what we put in both of the rooms," he said.

Stephan said incumbency is a key in state and local elections.

"Incumbency is a very strong thing," he said. "If incumbents lose, it's because they have lost contact with constituents. You're very ... vulnerable, especially on the local level."

Travis Stumpff, chairman of the College Republicans, said the group is trying to bring in speakers who can educate the group on the political process.

The next meeting, on March 6, will feature Lana Oleen, senator from the 22nd district, Stumpff said.

ZENITH DATA SYSTEMS INVITES YOU TO AN OPEN HOUSE DEMONSTRATION ON CAMPUS!

We know your schedule is busy. That's why we're bringing our Zenith Data Systems Computer Center to your campus.

Stop by our Open House in between classes or whenever you get some time. Sit down and experience the performance of a wide range of Zenith Data Systems computers—from battery-powered portables to advanced AT desktops. You'll see why Zenith Data Systems personal computers are among the preferred PC's on campus as well as at the office.

So, on the way to your next class, stop by the Zenith Data Systems Campus Open House and test a wide range of computer systems for yourself, including the one shown here. They're all available at incredible student prices during this special Open House. See you there!

A Zenith Data Systems Campus Demonstration Will Be Held At This Location:
